OPERATION OF VHF TELEVISION BOOSTER OR REPEATER STATIONS UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators CANNON, CASE of South Dakota, CHURCH, JACKSON, MCGEE, MOSS, O'MAHONEY, MANSFIELD, MURRAY, and LANGER, I submit a concurrent resolution, and ask for its appropriate reference. I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution lie on the desk for 5 calendar days so that other Members who may desire to cosponsor the same may affix their names to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the concurrent resolution will lie on the desk for 5 calendar days.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) favoring the operation of VHF television booster or repeater stations under certain conditions, was received, ordered to lie on the desk, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

Whereas VHF television repeater or booster stations provide the least expensive and in many cases the only existing means of providing television service to many areas of the United States; and

Whereas the public in areas served by such stations is satisfied with the service provided; and

Whereas the replacement of such stations with other means of providing television service would involve considerable expense on the part of the public: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the Federal Communications Commission should (1) authorize the operation of VHF television booster or repeater stations in all cases where the operation of such stations is a public convenience and necessity and where such operation does not actually cause objectionable interference with other communications or does not endanger the public safety, and (2) modify such of its rules and orders as may be necessary to carry out the policy expressed in this resolution.

Mr. MOSS subsequently said: Mr. President, I have enjoyed the debate, which is very enlightening, but I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to another interesting matter.

Mr. President, the recent Federal Communications Commission decision outlawing the operation of VHF booster stations will throw TV communications in the State of Utah into complete chaos. If this order is allowed to stand, it will deny to the people of a large area of the State the recreational and educational benefits of television at a price they can afford to pay.

TV coverage in Utah, with the exception of the area in straight line view from Salt Lake City, is almost exclusively provided by VHF booster-repeater stations. This is the only way many small, isolated communities in the mountainous areas of the West have been able to provide themselves with television reception at reasonable costs.

Many of these communities waited a long time for the Federal Communications Commission to offer suggestions on how the residents there could solve their TV reception problems. When the FCC showed no inclination to help them, the people took the initiative in their own hands and erected community-financed VHF reflectors or boosters to pick up signals out of the air from the surrounding hilltops and reflect them down into their homes in the valleys.

Now these people are being told that their systems are illegal and that they must convert to UHF frequencies. The new systems would be much more costly than the present systems.

What would happen in San Juan County, Utah, is an example. This county is located in the southeast corner of the State—an area remote from any broadcasting center. The current installation, which is operated under the auspices of the San Juan County Recreation Board and financed by direct tax assessment, is serving an audience of 10,000 to 12,000 people at an installation cost of approximately $10,000. To convert to a UHF installation would limit the coverage to probably half of that number of residents, and would cost from $40,000 to $50,000 to install. In addition, each individual set would have to be converted from VHF to UHF bands and provided with UHF antennas at the expense of each set owner. And then, as I understand it, the television picture would be inferior to the one now received.

The San Juan story will be repeated again and again in communities throughout the West if the FCC decision of December 31, 1958, is not rescinded, and standards are not adopted for VHF boosters.

The FCC itself is divided on the necessity for its prohibition of VHF boosters. Commissioner Craven, the only FCC Commissioner with an engineering background, who is considered to be one of the foremost authorities in radio engineering in the country, dissented from the action of the full Commission. He has stated that the Commission can and should establish reasonable rules providing for the authorization of VHF boosters on a practicable basis.

I am therefore joining with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] in sponsoring the resolution which would express the sense of the Congress as supporting the authorization of TV booster stations, and urging the FCC to modify its rules and orders.

I am also hopeful that the FCC will recognize the burdens it has caused by its decision, and proceed immediately to reexamine the whole problem. If there is any question in the Commission's mind with respect to the extent of the burden and the type of equipment that is now available, then it should hold an open hearing and allow interested parties to present their testimony in person so that a full and complete record can be developed. In my judgment, this problem of bringing television service to the remote areas is so important that I will urge the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. MAGNUSON] and the committee to request Commissioner

Craven and his colleagues to appear before the committee to explain the divergency in views with respect to the practicality of adopting reasonable rules. If necessary, I shall support appropriate legislation to meet the problem.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOSS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Utah for the very fine way in which he has expressed himself on a very difficult problem. This applies not only to the State of Utah and the State of Colorado, but also to the State of the Acting President pro tempore, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE] and to my own State of Montana, as well as to the States of the Rocky Mountain region as a whole. I am delighted that the Senator from Utah has seen fit to make his address today, because he has in a brief manner done a service on behalf of this particular problem. I know that because of the interest of the Senator from Utah and the interest of other Senators, especially those from the Rocky Mountain west, action will be forthcoming on this matter very shortly. I again commend the Senator.

Mr. MOSS. I thank the Senator.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF COMMITTEE PRINT ENTITLED "BRIEFING ON THE INVESTMENT ACT"

Mr. SPARKMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Select Committee on Small Business of the Senate seven thousand additional copies of the Committee print entitled "Briefing on the Investment Act."

CONTINUANCE OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON IMPROPER ACTIVITIES IN THE LABOR OR MANAGEMENT FIELD

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 44), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the select committee, authorized and directed to conduct an investigation and study of the extent to which criminal or other improper practices or activities are, or have been engaged in the field of labor-management relations or in groups or organizations of employees or employers, to the detriment of the interests of the public, employers, or employees, and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect such interests against the occurrence of such practices or activities, established by S. Res. 74, Eighty-fifth Congress, first session, agreed to January 30, 1957, as amended by S. Res. 88 of the Eighty-fifth Congress, first session, agreed to February 7, 1957, and extended by S. Res. 221 of the Eighty-fifth Congress, second session, is hereby continued. Any vacancy in the select committee so continued shall be filed in the same manner as the original appointments were made under section 2 of S. Res. 74, Eighty-fifth Congress, first session, as amended.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the select committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized, as it may deem necessary and appropriate to (1) make such expenditures from the contingent fund of the Senate; (2) hold such hearings; (3) sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjournment periods of the Senate; (4) require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents; (5) administer such oaths; (6) take such testimony, either orally or by deposition; (7) employ on a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants; and (8) with the prior consent of the executive department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, employ on a reimbursable basis such executive branch personnel as it deems advisable; and further with the consent of other committees or subcommittees, to work in conjunction with and utilize their staffs, as it shall be deemed necessary and appropriate in the judgment of the chairman of the select committee.

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of S. Res. 74, Eighty-fifth Congress, as amended, the select committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960, on which date the select committee shall cease to exist.

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of S. Res. 74, Eighty-fifth Congress, and S. Res. 221 of the Eighty-fifth Congress, second session, as amended, expenses of the select committee, under this resolution shall not exceed $750,000 and shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY STAFF AND FUNDS FOR COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. CHAVEZ submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 45) to provide additional temporary staff and funds for Committee on Public Works, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Works, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134 and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $150,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

JURISDICTION BY COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION OF PROPOSED CODE OF ETHICS APPLICABLE TO SENATORS AND EMPLOYEES OF SENATE

Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 46), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That paragraph (o) of subsection 1 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a new subparagraph to be subparagraph (3) to read as follows:

"(3) Such committee shall also have the duty to consider all matters arising in connection with the application of any code of ethics applicable to Members, officers, or employees of the Senate. The committee shall receive complaints of any violation of such code and may, upon request of any Senator, officer, or employee, give an advisory opinion to the Senator, officer, or employee involved on the conformity of any proposed conduct with any such code."

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO EXCUSING A SENATOR FROM VOTING IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 47), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That subsections 1 and 2 of rule XII of the Standing Rules of the Senate are hereby amended to read as follows:

"1. When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the question, unless excused by the Senate (but any Senator having a direct personal or pecuniary interest, not related to his official duties), in the event of such question shall be so excused without submission of the question of excuse to the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.

"2. When a Senator declines to vote on call of his name, he shall be required to assign his reasons therefor, and having assigned them, for any reason other than the assertion of a direct personal or pecuniary interest not related to his official duties, the Presiding Officer shall submit the question to the Senate: 'Shall the Senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?' which shall be decided without debate; and these proceedings shall be had after the rollcall and before the result is announced; and any further proceedings in reference thereto shall be after such announcement."

CONSTRUCTION OF BULLY CREEK DAM, OREG.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, last year, there was introduced in the other body House bill 7680 and in the Senate, Senate bill 2144, authorizing construction of the Bully Creek Dam and Reservoir in Malheur County, Oreg. H. R. 7680 was introduced by the Representative in whose district the project is located, Congressman ULLMAN, and S. 2144 by myself with my colleague as cosponsor.

This project would be an addition to the existing Vale reclamation project, it would also provide further flood control for the Malheur River, of which Bully Creek is a tributary.

I find that on January 20, a bill identical to S. 2144 of the 85th Congress was introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. I understand the Senator from Idaho was not aware of the fact that I had introduced this bill last year. I was pledged to the people of the area to reintroduce it this year. I would have been pleased to have my colleague cosponsor it again. I regret this act of legislative cribbing by my Oregon colleague.

In keeping with my own record of assistance to deserving Oregon projects, I again introduce my Bully Creek bill. The Bully Creek addition to the Vale project is a worthwhile one that deserves the support of all Members of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 639) to provide for the construction by the Secretary of the Interior of the Bully Creek Dam and other facilities, Vale Federal reclamation project, Oregon, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

NUTRITIONAL ENRICHMENT AND SANITARY PACKAGING OF CERTAIN FOOD DISTRIBUTED UNDER SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the nutritional enrichment and sanitary packaging of cornmeal, grits, white rice, and white flour distributed by the Federal Government under the National School Lunch Act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 651) to provide for the nutritional enrichment and sanitary packaging of cornmeal, grits, white rice, and white flour distributed by the Federal Government under the National School Lunch Act, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, since the inception of the school lunch program the Congress, through Federal Government agencies, has contributed immeasurably to the welfare of the Nation's schoolchildren. The hot, nutritional lunches afforded our children by school cafeterias are, in many cases, the only well-rounded meal enjoyed by children. Certainly, the school lunch program is one of the most commendable programs ever initiated by Congress and I am sure the money spent is being returned manyfold in the form of healthier men and women and a people better educated in the nutritional needs.

However, the South Carolina State nutrition committee has brought to my attention one aspect of the school lunch program which should be changed. Certain commodities distributed by the Federal Government are not enriched and are not packaged in sanitary containers. This not only deprives the children of the nutrition needed, but it adds to waste. We, in South Carolina, as in 27 other States, have State laws requiring that cereal grains be enriched before being sold. Yet, the Federal Government distributed to the schools in South Carolina alone during the fiscal year 1957 nearly 600,000 pounds of unenriched rice. Not only was the rice not enriched, but it was received in 100-pound burlap bags usually soiled and torn during the shipment. Dirt and various foreign particles, including the burlap hair, had found their way into the bags. This necessitates a thorough washing of the rice before it is cooked and this further takes away nutritional value. A great part of the rice and other commodities issued under the school lunch program is being wasted because of poor packaging and much of the nutritional value of the commodities is being deprived the schoolchildren.

We should correct this situation so as to insure our children of enriched, sanitary foods by shipping them properly.

Another aspect of this problem is that our school lunch program employees in the various local schools, usually women of the community, cannot handle 100-pound packages of food. Smaller packages not only would provide sanitary conditions but would enable these employees to handle these foods more properly.

The proposed legislation which I offer at this time will provide that the cornmeal, grits, rice, and white flour which may be distributed to the schools be enriched nutritionally and packaged in sanitary containers so as to insure the sanitary arrival of the contents. It also provides that these packages not exceed 50 pounds in weight so as to permit easier handling.

CODE OF ETHICS FOR OFFICIALS AND EMPLOYEES OF LEGISLATIVE AND ADMINISTRATIVE BRANCHES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] and myself, I introduce two bills, a joint resolution, and submit two resolutions to establish an enforceable code of ethics covering officials and employees of the legislative and administrative branches of the Federal Government.

Included in the proposed legislation is a measure requiring that regulatory agencies make a part of the public record all types of communications from Members of Congress concerning any cases which come before them.

Congress has so far failed to meet its responsibility to enact meaningful legislation governing ethical standards of conduct and conflict of interest situations involving the more than 2,300,000 Federal officers and employees who work in the legislative and executive branches.

During the last session, partially as the result of the controversy over the Adams case, a code of ethics was adopted by the Congress, which consisted of 10 rather general statements of moral purpose. It supplied neither the guidance for specific incidents which is so needed, nor the enforcement machinery for weeding out the rare cases of unethical behavior which reflect adversely on the whole Government service. Its shortcomings were pointed out in a report of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. It is not a mandate, the report states. It does not impose any positive legal requirement for specific acts or omissions. Obviously, then, the need for positive, comprehensive legislation in this field is still an urgent matter. I believe Congress should act now, not wait for the emotions caused by a single newsworthy controversy to bring out many improvised proposals. The voters have every right to expect that their representatives in Congress will establish for their own guidance and for that of members of the executive branch a code of ethics no less exacting than that governing professions like medicine and the law. And like their codes, it should provide means for disciplining violators.

I fully expect that the proposals we are introducing today will be referred to the Committees on Labor and Public Welfare, and Rules and Administration. As a member of both committees, I will press for immediate consideration of this legislation, which was developed as a result of my experience as attorney general of New York State. Several of the provisions in our bills are also supported by recommendations of the House Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight issued in its report of January 3, 1959.

The five proposals introduced by my colleague and myself are as follows:

First. A bill to establish a Federal Code of Ethics which spells out in specific terms standards of ethical conduct for legislative and executive officials; violators in the executive branch are subject to discharge, and, in addition, the Attorney General may bring civil action against them for recovery of damages.

Second. A bill requiring that any written or oral communications between any Member of Congress or his staff and a regulatory agency dealing with a matter before it must be part of the public record.

Third. A resolution amending the Senate rules to give the Rules Committee jurisdiction over cases of alleged violation of Federal ethical standards involving Members of the Senate or their staffs; it can also issue advisory opinions on the propriety of proposed official conduct.

Fourth. A joint resolution to set up a bipartisan Commission on Ethics in the Federal Government to study existing conflict of interest regulations and make recommendations for a more comprehensive ethical code.

Fifth. A resolution permitting Senators to abstain from voting on matters where they may have direct personal interest in the legislation, without having to secure the permission of the Senate.

The interim Federal Code of Ethics in effect while the Commission carries out its year-long study is closely patterned after that adopted by New York State a few years ago and put into operation while I was Attorney General of New York. It would require officials to file with the Comptroller General a statement of their substantial financial interests in activities regulated by the Federal Government. Other provisions specify that not only must the official maintain his integrity in fact, but he may not engage in any activity or in any way create a reasonable impression which could give rise to a suspicion that any person unduly enjoys his favor or that he is otherwise in violation of the high standards of his public trust.

This interim code would also include prohibitions against the following:

Outside employment which would impair objectivity in the exercise of official duties;

Business or professional activity requiring the disclosure of confidential Government information—disclosure of such confidential information to further personal interests;

Use of official position to secure unwarranted privileges or exemptions for himself or others;

Serving two masters: the Government and a private enterprise.

Personal investments in enterprises which the officer might have to regulate or pass upon in his official capacity; and Selling goods or services to a person or corporation which is regulated by the State agency in which the public officer or employee is employed.

We cannot eliminate all the doubtful shadow areas in the field of possible conflict. What we must do is set up reasonable standards which can and will be followed, without tying in so much redtape the administrative and legislative process that it ceases to function effectively. Excessive requirements which would unduly publicize an official's personal affairs may well have the effect of keeping out of Government service many able men who have made their mark in the business world, but who would not wish to have every private gift and private source of income, no matter how innocent, a matter of public knowledge. A declaration of substantial outside interests is reasonable and reporting to the Comptroller General such interests over a certain amount like $10,000 might be the solution, and my code so provides; so, too, for the unacceptability of expensive gifts.

Congress has been dealing with this problem since the adoption by the House of Representatives on April 7, 1789, of its first rules, providing that: "No Member shall vote on any question, in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested." I hope that we can meet this responsibility now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills, joint resolution, and resolutions will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, joint resolution, and resolutions, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING), were received and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 658. A bill to establish a code of ethics for the executive and legislative branches of the Government; and

S. J. Res. 30. Joint resolution to establish a Commission on Ethics in the Federal Government to study and develop necessary legislation as to conflicts of interest, including a code of ethics applicable to Members, officers and employees of Congress and to officers and employees of the executive branch of Government.

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. 671. A bill to amend the Administrative Procedure Act to provide for the disclosure of certain communications received by Government agencies from Members of Congress with respect to adjudicatory matters, and for other purposes.

To the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. Res. 46. Resolution conferring upon the Committee on Rules and Administration jurisdiction over any proposed code of ethics applicable to Members, officers, or employees of the Senate; and

S. Res. 47. Resolution to amend rule XII, relative to excusing a Senator from voting in cases involving conflict of interest.

REPEAL OF LAWS RELATING TO NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE] and myself, I introduce a bill to repeal the laws relating to the naval petroleum reserves and to provide for the administration of the lands in such reserves by the Secretary of the Interior, under the provisions of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920.

I assume that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which deals with the proposal of the President to dispose of these reserves.

I read from page M–35 of the President's budget message, the following brief paragraph:

> The continued and rapid growth in the use of petroleum products has made questionable the need for maintenance of the relatively small naval petroleum reserves as a significant defense measure, since it would appear that the nationwide, even worldwide, petroleum industry must be relied upon to provide efficiently for our petroleum requirements in both peace and war. Accordingly, the administration will study (and I would hope the Congress would do likewise) the advisability of disposing of the anachronistic naval petroleum reserves, thereby relieving the Department of the Navy of an inappropriate responsibility and also providing additional revenue to the Federal Government.

It will be observed that in this brief paragraph the President states very clearly his belief that the petroleum industry, worldwide, must be depended upon in both peace and war to supply the petroleum needs of the United States. Up to the present moment, under a restraining order authorized by Congress the President has attempted to restrict the imports of crude oil from abroad, because it has been stated by an agency of the Federal Government authorized to make such a statement that it is essential in the defense of the United States to maintain domestic petroleum production.

It will also be noted that in this statement the President speaks of the disposal of these reserves. The records indicate that there are about 40 million acres within the 4 petroleum reserves. Two of them are in California, namely, the Elk Hills and the Buena Vista. Another, the Teapot Dome, is in Wyoming; and the fourth is in Alaska.

I am certain that the sentiment of the country would be against the sale of these reserves to private interests. Under the Mineral Leasing Act there is plenty of opportunity to administer these reserves in a manner which would provide income for the Federal Government, for the States concerned, and for the school districts in the various States.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ENGLE. Is it possible, under the suggestion made by the President, that these reserves might be put up for private disposition as surplus property, under the General Services Administration, rather than being administered in the usual manner by the Department of the Interior?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The President suggests a study. I do not believe he contemplates any precipitate action. But let me invite attention again to the language which he used.

Accordingly, the administration will study (and I would hope the Congress would do likewise) the advisability of disposing of the anachronistic naval petroleum reserves, thereby relieving the Department of the Navy of an inappropriate responsibility and also providing additional revenue to the Federal Government.

A few sentences before he spoke of his recommendation that the Government dispose of these reserves. Observe the language—"the advisability of disposing of the anachronistic naval petroleum reserves." That could be interpreted as selling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair regrets to say that the time of the senior Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I realize that my time has expired, and I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill introduced by the senior Senator from Wyoming for himself and his colleague will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 661) to repeal the laws relating to the naval petroleum reserves and to provide for the administration of the lands in such reserves by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself and Mr. McGEE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

AMENDMENT OF SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT RELATING TO FARMER COMMITTEEMEN

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], a bill to give some legislative status to the farmer-elected committee system used in directing our farm programs at the local level, and to better protect the rights of farmers serving on such committees.

Mr. President, this bill is the result of several years of sincere effort to protect and preserve the best example of grassroots democracy that exists—the use of local committees, composed of farmers who have been chosen by their farmer neighbors, to administer their own farm programs for the Secretary of Agriculture.

Legislation for this purpose was first introduced by myself in January of 1955. Since that time, extensive hearings have been conducted by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which I was honored to serve as chairman. Because of information revealed in those hearings, they were broadened into an investigation of abuses of our committee system as now administered, with field hearings held in Missouri.

After 2 years of study and negotiations with the Department of Agriculture, our subcommittee submitted a report on abuses and disruptions of the elected farmer committee system which was published as a committee print. In the early days of the 85th Congress I introduced a bill which we felt met the needs as shown by the evidence developed at hearings and views expressed by the Department of Agriculture.

That bill came to the Senate for full discussion near the close of the last session. It was amended to reflect the views of some of my distinguished colleagues regarding the status of the State extension director and certain election procedures. These amendments were acceptable to me and to the subcommittee members, and to the Senate as a whole. The bill was then passed by the Senate by voice vote. The bill which I am introducing today is the exact bill which was passed by the Senate last year.

Mr. President, these committees deserve the serious attention and thought of the Congress. Elected farmer committees are responsible for administering seven major agricultural programs involving billions of dollars in Government funds and property.

The elected farmer committee system is a proven established system of administration. It has handled billions of dollars with full safeguard of the public interest during the past 24 years. This system is a shining example of true democratic self-government in action.

Mr. President, the fact that a few abuses have crept into handling of the committee system is no reflection on the system itself, nor on the fine men who have served rural America as committee members. Rather, it just focuses the spotlight on the need for a legislative framework clarifying methods of committee operation and pinpointing better understanding of their responsibility in relation to the administrative responsibility of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Since early 1953, basic changes have been made in the elected farmer committee system by mandates handed down from Washington. These changes have reduced the authority of the farmer committees. Furthermore, the arbitrary pattern of operation imposed upon the counties by Washington has invaded the original concept of keeping some guidance of these programs in the hands of local people. Concern that such a pattern might distort the elected farmer committee system into a bureaucracy and patronage system has led to the action we are asking in this bill.

Most of us, I am sure, are familiar with the background of the farmer committee system in our respective States. The agricultural depression of the late twenties and early thirties was characterized by low agricultural commodity prices, low and falling income, vanishing markets, and overburdening mortgage debt. The program of economic aid for agriculture, born of dark necessity, came into being. The question of how to administer this program without bringing hordes of bureaucrats onto every farm in the country was much discussed.

The idea of having committees, groups, or associations of farmers administer the early adjustment and income-lifting programs originated with M. L. Wilson, at that time head of the department of agricultural economics at Montana State College. He has through the years been one of the most active of the agricultural leaders who have worked with Congress and others to produce measures making it possible for agriculture to live more nearly on an economic par with other groups. Mr. Wilson has deservedly received many high honors and great esteem for his work, and not the least is the honorary title "Father of the Farmer Committee System."

One of the chief values of this system was that the normal political patterns of an area did not interfere with program administration. The focus was on program rather than on party. And any partisan attempts to upset this pattern incurred resentment. The temptations toward partisanship inherent in the appointive system were reduced, if not eliminated, by the elected committee system. Partisan control of farmer committees could never succeed as a goal of administration because control could be achieved only by local ballot.

This is the farmer committee system that successfully met the challenge of operating the necessary adjustment programs in the early thirties. It succeeded because it had the confidence and cooperation of farmers.

It was the system which, because of the grassroots character of its members, became the backbone of the war mobilization committees in rural areas of the country. These committees rationed farm machinery and other scarce materials; worked with draft boards on problems relating to agriculture; handled farm drives of every description, including the collection of scrap, encouraging production of special crops needed in the war, and collection of 80 million bushels of scarce corn in the winter of 1944 to keep war industries running. This also was the system which helped to maintain high production of food during the critical postwar years—food which enabled some countries to stand off absorption by the Communist bloc until productive capacity and facilities were more fully restored.

A good many men of both parties prominent in public life came up through the farmer committee ranks. These include a Senator, several Congressmen, a Secretary of Agriculture, four Under Secretaries of Agriculture, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and two Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, including the incumbent Marvin McLain, of Iowa.

This was the elected farmer committee system in effect when the present officials of the Department of Agriculture took office. It was an inheritance truly American in concept, rich in tradition, great in performance, and abundant in promise—an inheritance to be prized.

Today this system faces new challenges in agriculture. Now more than ever before, we need the grassroots cooperation of agriculture in climbing out of another economic bog. We need a committee system in which farmers have confidence, and which can get and keep the cooperation and respect of farmers.

Many of us fear we are headed in the other direction. For that reason we want to recognize the contribution of these committees to American agriculture by establishing their rights under law.

The bill I propose with my cosponsors merits the support of everyone who really believes in grassroots democracy. I can see little grounds for anyone opposing it unless he fails to believe in the concept of a local voice in these programs—unless such opponents prefer an army of bureaucrats directed by orders from on high in Washington.

The Department of Agriculture has assured us repeatedly that it still believes in the farmer committee concept and wants the system preserved and strengthened. If that is true, I see no reason for objection to doing so by specific legislation, rather than leaving these farmers at the whim of any Secretary or Administrator through administrative edicts.

Our bill protects the Secretary by keeping primary authority in his hands, but at the same time it lets the elected committeeman know just what his responsibilities are and what his rights are.

We provide that community committeemen shall be nominated in open meeting from the floor and elected by secret ballot at such community meetings. We provide for chairmen of each community committee to gather in country nominating conventions, to nominate farmers for each position to be filled on the county committee, including alternates, with provision for write-in of additional candidates in the election to follow by secret ballot. We provide for all farmers being eligible to vote.

We provide further that members of county committees elected through this process shall in turn elect a slate of farmers from whom the Secretary shall select the nominees to serve on the State committee with those members who have been appointed by the Secretary.

This change in the manner of selecting the State committees charged with the operation of so many of the most important programs of the Department of Agriculture would result in a committee more responsive to the operations of programs at the county level. It would insure the grassroots kind of thinking essential to successful local administration. The authority of the Secretary would not be lessened by this move, as a majority of the State committee members would still be his direct appointees, and subject to removal by him without question. The member selected from the nominees elected by the county committees, however, would not be subject to dismissal without show of cause as he would in essence be an elected representative. This phase is undoubtedly not one that could cause objections since no Secretary of Agriculture would remove any member of a State committee without adequate and just cause. However, as this bill is designed to protect the rights and status of elected committee members, we felt this should be spelled out.

In further acknowledgment of the fact that removal of an elected official by an appointed bureaucrat is a serious action, we seek to curb the power of the State committee to remove elected county committeemen without holding a proper hearing. We limit the power of the State committee to suspension, following a majority vote, and giving the accused a statement of charges and advice as to his rights and opportunities for appeal. It is only simple American justice that such procedures be established.

This bill substitutes removal hearings for appeal hearings at the State office level. In other words, this requires that charges upon which a committeeman was suspended be proven before he is removed, and that he be given an opportunity to answer such charges against him.

We retain final appeal rights to the Department of Agriculture whenever such removal action has been taken.

I am convinced that this is constructive proposed legislation in keeping with the true spirit of our democracy, and that it will improve the handling of our farm programs without in any way hampering the functions of any Secretary of Agriculture.

The thousands of fine Americans who have served so loyally and well in these farmer committees deserve the recognition that enactment of this proposed legislation in their behalf would provide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 662) to amend section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act as amended, to provide for administration of farm programs by democratically elected farmer committeemen, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ACQUISITION OF ADDITIONAL FOOD COMMODITIES FOR DISTRIBUTION TO NEEDY PERSONS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], I introduce for appropriate reference, and ask that it lie on the desk 1 week, a bill to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire additional food commodities for distribution to needy persons. The intent of this bill is to provide funds with which the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase food items to supplement the commodities presently being distributed to needy persons under the surplus removal and price support programs. The Secretary would be authorized and directed during the remainder of fiscal year 1959 to use not to exceed $40 million of the funds made available for the purposes of section 32 of the act of August 24, 1935, and during fiscal year 1960 to use not to exceed $160 million of such funds for the purpose which I have already mentioned.

In America today, due to the continuing economic recession, there is a total of 4,903,000 persons who are in the demoralizing and cheerless position of being dependent upon inadequate rations of Government surplus foods. In my own State of West Virginia, there are 306,000 such persons—a total of 15.2 percent of the State's entire population, and West Virginia leads the list of States in this regard. The quantity of food received by families is insufficient to provide the minimum requirements for health. In fact, the Bureau of Nutrition of our West Virginia Department of Health has stated that the quantity now being given to West Virginia families supplies only 26 percent of the needed calories, 36 percent of the necessary protein, and 46 percent of the required calcium. Unless additional foods are provided in the diets of these unfortunate persons, the health of men, women, and children is going to deteriorate. Presently only butter, flour, meal, rice, and dried milk are going to needy families under the welfare program. It is imperative that we take action to provide these citizens and their families with additional items in their diets. The passage of this bill would permit the Secretary to take this step and it is the intent of the authors of the measure that the Secretary should concentrate upon the purchase of basic, moderately priced, good protein items which may be effectively and efficiently transported, stored, and distributed, and I am thinking of such foods as canned meats, dried beans, powdered eggs, and shortening. While the Secretary should take care to plan for orderly purchases to avoid market disruption, it is not believed that the levels of expenditure set forth in the bill, if the purchases are carefully and wisely made, can significantly disrupt a food market which retails about $50 billion worth of food a year.

It is also the intent of this bill that these supplemental food items shall be made available to the States under the same terms and conditions now in effect governing the distribution of surplus commodities to needy families, these having been shipped in carload lots to points designated by the States. The bill is not a mandate to the Secretary to expend the full amounts authorized. It is expected that he should adjust this supplemental purchase program so that it will augment the varieties of foods available under the regular surplus donation program. Therefore, the need for expenditure for additional foods would be lesser or greater, depending upon the amount and variety of surplus foods available.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] and I hope that other Senators will join in cosponsoring this legislation. It is a humanitarian piece of legislation, written in the interest of thousands of our fine citizens who, through no fault of their own, have become unemployed, and are now living in penury, privation, and want. If we can provide billions for hungry peoples overseas, we can expend a few million dollars for our own flesh and blood.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I am delighted to yield to my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am in agreement in every particular with the timely remarks of my able colleague from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. I desire to associate myself with his challenging comments.

However, I wish also to focus the attention of our fellow Senators on certain statistical facts as they relate to the shortage in nutritional values of the diet provided needy West Virginians in the limited surplus food items on which thousands of them are forced by necessity to exist.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the informative article by Harry Ernst, published in the Charleston (W. Va.) Sunday Gazette-Mail of January 18, 1959, entitled "For 300,000 West Virginians: A Slow Starvation Diet?"

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOR 300,000 WEST VIRGINIANS: A SLOW STARVATION DIET?

(By Harry Ernst)

So you can't afford butter and envy the 300,000 West Virginians who receive a free supply each month.

Pause and reflect on the drab, inadequate meals which they can prepare—day after day after day—with the surplus food commodities they get from Uncle Sam.

A typical family of four, with possibly an income up to $130 a month to cover all other living expenses, will receive these surplus commodities: 20 pounds of flour, 10 pounds of corn meal, 9 pounds of powdered milk, 2 pounds of rice, 4 pounds of butter (thanks to the U.S. Government's subsidy of farm dairy products) and, until this month, 10 pounds of cheese.

Obviously, man can't live by surplus commodities alone.

They don't provide what nutritional experts consider to be an adequate diet. Without cheese, the 300,000 West Virginians drawing surplus commodities get:

Only 26 percent of the calories they need each month, 36 percent of the proteins, and 46 percent of the calcium. These figures were provided by the State health department's bureau of nutrition.

"It's fairly obvious that this isn't an adequate diet," said Mrs. Marian B. Cornell, director of the bureau. "They also would need other foodstuffs to fully utilize these commodities."

The bureau of nutrition has sponsored cooking demonstrations and adapted recipes to help recipients get the most from their surplus commodities.

Mrs. Cornell said it would take about $12 a week at present prices to buy the additional foodstuffs—including other cereals, fats, vegetables, juices, potatoes, and fruit—to give a family of five an adequate diet.

The bureau also recommends what essential items to buy at the lowest cost.

"Surplus commodities are purchased by the Federal Government to aid agriculture," explained William Waggy, supervisor of commodity distribution for the State department of public assistance.

"They weren't intended to provide a balanced diet. However, they are a tremendous help for needy families."

Mrs. Cornell and social workers heartily agree.

How many West Virginians are dependent on surplus commodities alone to stay alive?

No figures are available, but probably a small percentage of the 300,000 individuals and families now receiving them.

"Most of them do have some income, largely unemployment compensation," Waggy said.

State unemployment compensation benefits have been averaging about $22 to $24 a week. If they spent the recommended $12 a week for additional foodstuffs, this would leave $10 to $12 to meet all other living expenses.

"I would say that only a small percentage of the recipients are dependent wholly on surplus commodities," said Mrs. Nellie White, a case worker for the Salvation Army, which helps determine their eligibility.

But she questioned whether their limited incomes would permit them to buy enough additional foodstuffs to provide a sufficient diet.

For example, a family of two adults and one or more children can qualify for surplus commodities only if their income doesn't exceed $130 a month.

Take out rent, utilities, clothing and other expenses and hardly any money would be left to buy food—even if the family had a monthly income of $130.

Other income limitations placed on recipients include $50 a month for a single person, $85 a month for a man and his wife, and $95 for a father or mother and one child.

Many of the recipients of surplus commodities, of course, have incomes below these eligibility limits.

They would include elderly persons living on small pensions, the unemployed who've exhausted their unemployment compensation benefits and those with tiny DPA welfare grants.

In recent months, at least 26,000 West Virginia workers have exhausted their unemployment compensation benefits—which means they now have no income except, possibly, what they pick up from occasional odd jobs.

"Very few of those who receive surplus commodities aren't eligible for them," Waggy said. "We're constantly checking to eliminate the few people who become ineligible after they find jobs."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 663) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire additional food commodities for distribution to needy persons, introduced by Mr. BYRD of West Virginia (for himself and Mr. RANDOLPH), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Federal Airport Act to extend the time for making grants for the construction of urgent airport projects essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system.

As I understand it, this bill represents the recommendation of the President for a gradual withdrawal of the Federal Government from the airport assistance program. Essentially, it is at variance with S. 1, a bill which I have cosponsored with many of my distringuished colleagues and which would carry on the program at increased levels of authorized funds on a 50–50 matching basis for the next 5 years. I have authorized the Aviation Subcommittee to conduct hearings on S. 1 which began yesterday, continue today, and will end Monday, January 26.

As chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I feel it my duty, in accordance with usual custom and practice, to honor the request of the Administrator and introduce this bill. However, I would like to emphasize that this fact should not be construed as an endorsement of all phases of its contents.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency explaining the purposes of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 674) to amend the Federal Airport Act to extend the time for making grants for the construction of urgent airport projects essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and Mr. SCHOEPPEL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The letter presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

FEDERAL AVIATION AGENCY,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is requested that the enclosed draft of bill be introduced in the Senate at your convenience.

The title of this proposal is "to amend the Federal Airport Act to extend the time for making grants for the construction of urgent airport projects essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system."

This proposal would amend the Federal Airport Act to extend its operation, which is due to expire on June 30, 1959, for an additional period of 4 years ending June 30, 1963. It would also authorize the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency to obligate $200 million of Federal funds for airport aid, providing $65 million, $55 million, $45 million, and $35 million for each of the four fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, 1961, 1962, and 1963, respectively.

This bill provides a positive program for meeting the true needs for which the Federal Government should properly be responsible. It assures that Federal participation will continue for the period necessary to afford ample opportunity to the States and local communities to assume their proper responsibility without disruption of needed airport development. At the same time, it reflects our conviction that the time has come for the Federal Government to begin an orderly withdrawal from the airport grant program.

Our predecessor agency, the Civil Aeronautics Administration, made an exhaustive study of airport needs. This study indicated that, in the interest of safety, there was urgent need for projects such as runways, taxiways, and ramp facilities to accommodate increased flying activity and the new jet operations. Further need was shown for towers and land acquisitions to provide approach areas free from obstructions. Many of these urgent projects were found to be needed at one or another of the 72 airports which, by the end of 1961, will serve the approximately 500 jet aircraft that the air carriers will then have in operation.

The critical need for the construction and development of airports will reach its peak during the year 1960, and it is estimated that $65 million of Federal airport aid will be needed to finance the construction and development of those airport projects which should be accomplished during the coming fiscal year. During the following 3 years, the need for the development of additional airport facilities will gradually taper off with a consequent reduction in the need for Federal funds.

Additionally, the study indicated some need for projects for back of the ramp facilities such as terminal buildings, entrance roads and automobile parking areas. This Agency feels, however, that Federal aid should be concentrated on airport facilities directly needed for safe and efficient flight operations. The construction, maintenance and operation of our civil airports has always been primarily a matter of local responsibility. Aviation has now achieved a state of maturity in which airports are becoming more financially self-sufficient. This trend toward self-sufficiency is expected to continue and should be encouraged by the Federal Government. These principles are based on proper assignment of State and local responsibility as well as on the basic philosophy that there should be an end of expectation that Federal funds will be available for projects which either do in fact, or should reasonably be expected to, provide sufficient revenue to attract financing from sources other than Federal-aid funds.

The Agency's decision to begin an orderly withdrawal from the airport grant program is also based on the hard fact that the Government must now devote those resources it can make available for the promotion of civil aviation to programs which cannot be assumed by others. Airports constitute only a part of the Federal financial support of civil aviation. The greater expenditure by far must go to the necessary operation, expansion and improvement of our air traffic control system. The urgent needs of this system will require huge expenditures of Federal funds during the 5 fiscal years from 1959 through 1963. At the same time, this Agency believes, and there is general agreement on this, that urgent airport projects which are essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system must be accomplished and that, unless the Federal aid airport program is continued, they will not be properly expedited.

We believe that the bill would provide the necessary funds for those urgent projects which are essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system. The Federal Government's participation in the airport-grant program would be limited to such projects and would include only those projects which lie in front of the gate. This principle would be incorporated into the law by amending the definition of "Airport Development" in section 2(a)(3) of the Federal Airport Act.

The term "Airport Development," as amended, would limit grants under the Federal Airport Act to construction relating to landing-area facilities such as runways, taxiways, aircraft ramps, control-tower structures, and installations for the lighting of such facilities. It would make ineligible the construction of administration and terminal buildings, automobile parking lots, entrance roads, sidewalks, and other nonaeronautical facilities on the airport.

Finally, the proposal would amend section 6 of the Federal Airport Act to revise the provisions for apportionment of funds among the States.

By statute the Administrator now is required to apportion among the several States 75 percent of the amounts made available for each fiscal year. The remaining 25 percent becomes part of a discretionary fund, available for such uses as are determined to be most appropriate for carrying out the national airport plan, regardless of where those projects are located, and for projects in national parks, recreation areas, etc. The funds apportioned to the several States remain available until the end of the second fiscal year following the date on which they first became available. At the expiration of that time, if funds apportioned to a particular State remain unobligated they are reapportioned in accordance with the same 75–25-percent formula.

Experience demonstrates that approximately 17 percent of the funds allocated to States are not matched. Ultimately they are reallocated. But, in the meantime, these moneys which should have been used for urgently needed airport development are frozen. There have always been requests for more funds than were available. This amendment would permit allocation to the discretionary fund of 50 percent of the amounts authorized to be obligated and would provide that at the expiration of the second fiscal year following the date on which funds first become available such part of the funds apportioned to a particular State as have not been committed will become a part of the discretionary fund and be available for those urgently needed projects which the Administrator considers to be most appropriate.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that enactment of this legislation would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

E. R. QUESADA,
Administrator.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the bill just introduced, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared on the administration's airport improvement bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCHOEPPEL ON THE ADMINISTRATION AIRPORT IMPROVEMENT BILL

The role of the Federal Government in relation to any mode of transportation must change as conditions change. In recognition of that fact, the 85th Congress overhauled and updated the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. The result was the Federal Aviation Act of 1958.

The 85th Congress sought also to enact a new Federal Airport Act, but that effort encountered a Presidential veto. Yesterday, the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, through its Aviation Subcommittee, began hearings on S. 1 and on the administration bill that has just been introduced (S. 674).

Because of the radical changes in civil aviation crowding upon us, the Federal Airport Act needs to be updated, and the Federal Government's role in the matter of airport grants needs to be reexamined. I seriously question, though, whether it is enough to take the old law, extend it a few years, and double the rate of spending in the simple belief that progress costs money and that anyhow everything costs more nowadays.

In contrast, the administration bill, for which I ask your earnest consideration, is grounded on a careful study of what the Federal Government ought to do in this day and age with respect to airport grants and how much money it can prudently spend in discharge of its proper role.

The administration bill runs for 4 years, fiscal 1960, 1961, 1962, and 1963. This is 1 year less than provided in S. 1.

The administration bill calls for the spending of $200 million over the 4 years, as contrasted with S. 1's cost of $575 million over 5 years.

The administration bill provides for peak spending in fiscal 1960, which is the year of peak needs. Thereafter, the rate of spending tapers off. The sums provided would be $65 million in fiscal 1960, $55 million in fiscal 1961, $45 million in fiscal 1962, and $35 million in fiscal 1963. The Monroney bill would provide $100 million for each of those years and 1 more, and it would also make available an extra $75 million to be spent beginning next July 1 at the discretion of the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency.

The differences between the administration bill and S. 1 are not merely differences of money and time. The bills differ in fundamental philosophy and in solicitude for the taxpayer.

The philosophy of the Monroney bill is that most people who fly, fly interstate, and that therefore the problems of civil aviation are Federal problems. The administration bill is rooted in the belief that the Federal role should be limited to contributing to the safety needs of airports, and that it is up to the States and local communities to make passengers happy that they have arrived at Tulsa or Atlanta or Wichita. The administration bill would assist in paying for runways, taxiways, aprons, control towers, and housing for essential communications and weather stations. It would have others provide administration buildings, and terminals, be they monuments or quonset huts.

Under the present Federal Airport Act and under S. 1, 25 percent of the sum that may be obligated in any year goes into a discretionary fund. The administration bill puts 50 percent into the discretionary fund, thus providing flexibility to meet urgent requirements where they actually exist.

The administration bill would also recapture for the Administrator's discretionary fund such sums, apportioned to the States, as remain unused for 2 years. Under existing law, and under S. 1, funds unused for 2 years revert and are reapportioned. Enactment of the administration bill would pick up $1½ million on July 1, 1959, for immediate use which would otherwise revert for reapportionment.

The hearings now under way before the Aviation Subcommittee may demonstrate that the best Federal Airport Act of 1959 is one merging features of the administration bill and S. 1. Thus far, however, there has been no showing that the $100 million per year called for by S. 1 is anything other than a figure snatched from the air—a good round number that is easy to remember, like S. 1 itself. I suspect that by the time the hearings are completed, the record will be clear that S. 1 costs too much and is too lenient on some who share with the Federal Government responsibility for airport development.

DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Government Operations, Senator MCCLELLAN, Senator ERVIN, and myself, I am introducing for appropriate reference, a bill to create a Department of Science and Technology, and to transfer certain agencies and functions relating to science to such a Department.

A bill, entitled the "Science and Technology Act of 1958," was introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and myself during the 85th Congress. That bill contained separate titles proposing (a) creation of a Department of Science and Technology; (b) coordination and improvement of Federal functions relating to assembling, translating, collating, retrieval, and distribution of scientific information; (c) establishment of standing committees on science in the House and Senate; (d) authorizing educational loans for the purpose of encouraging and assisting students beyond the secondary school level in the fields of the physical and biological sciences, mathematics, and engineering; (e) establishment of national institutes of scientific research; and (f) establishment of cooperative programs outside of the United States for collecting, collating, translating, abstracting, and disseminating scientific and technological information, and to conduct and support other scientific activities through the use of foreign currency credits.

In a progress report issued by the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations on September 9, 1958, a résumé was made of all legislation enacted by the 85th Congress—Senate Report 2498—which was in general accord with the provisions of the Science and Technology Act of 1958 or had some relationship to the numerous science programs of the Federal Government.

The staff of the Committee on Government Operations is presently preparing a supplemental report on administrative actions taken to implement the science programs established under authority of legislation approved in the 85th Congress. This report, which will be submitted to the Senate later this month, will include details concerning the operations of the program approved by the last Congress, authorizing the National Science Foundation to initiate, first, a program for the coordination of Federal activities dealing with the gathering, collating, and distribution of scientific information, and to contract through private groups qualified in this field for the performance of such services as are necessary to perfect a national program to insure that scientific information will be made available to scientists and others who require such information; second, administrative actions in other areas of science, such as the effectiveness of programs relating to educational grants and the utilization of foreign currencies in the assembling, translating, and distribution of scientific materials abroad through the use of foreign credits; and, third, establishment of institutes of scientific research as proposed in the original Science and Technology Act of 1958, in the fields of meteorology, oceanography, and other basic sciences which will require substantial Federal support and contributions.

The National Science Foundation is now preparing, in cooperation with the staff of the committee, detailed information on these three subjects which will be incorporated in the committee's report to the Senate.

Such report will also set forth other advancements made in the fields of science by administrative action pursuant to congressional authorization during the interval following the enactment of the science programs by the 85th Congress. From information already available, Government operations have extended to all fields covered by the Science and Technology Act of 1958, such as documentation, educational loans and grants, establishment of central institutes of science, and utilization of foreign credits for the development of programs for assembling and distributing scientific information and the advancement of other science programs abroad. The report will further indicate to the Congress what the operating agencies may require in the nature of additional authority by way of enabling legislation which will be under consideration by the appropriate jurisdictional committees, or, through increases in expenditure authorizations.

Title I of the Science and Technology Act of 1958, proposing the creation of a Department of Science and Technology is the only section of the original bill upon which no legislative action was taken during the 85th Congress. In its report to the Senate, however, the subcommittee stated, page 14, that—

> The Committee on Government Operations was not afforded an opportunity to hold hearings on title I during the 85th Congress, due to the rereference of the bill to the Senate Special Committee on Astronautics and Space, but the staff, at the direction of the committee, has maintained a continuing study of the proposal to establish a Department of Science. The response of scientists to the staff proposal to establish a Department, since the release of Senate Document 90, has been most gratifying and helpful. Constructive criticisms in opposition to the proposal, as well as stimulating and cogent alternative suggestions have been received and will continue to be sought by the committee. The committee, therefore, proposes to hold hearings on the original and alternative proposals in the 86th Congress and to give all of them careful consideration, with a view to recommending additional reorganization of science programs in the executive branch of the Government as may be found to be necessary to effect the essential coordination of such activities.

The proposed legislation is being introduced today by the senior Senator from Arkansas and myself in order that a full evaluation may be made as to the essential steps that should be taken now to properly reorganize and coordinate the various science programs of the Federal Government, and to insure that this Nation shall continue to advance in the sciences and assume its responsibilities to the free world in this significant area.

Opportunity will be afforded to representatives of the scientific community, the Government and other interested areas, to submit their views in open hearings before the committee so that the best possible legislative recommendations can be made to the Senate for its consideration.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie over through the close of business on Tuesday, January 27, to permit the addition of additional cosponsors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The bill (S. 676) to create a Department of Science and Technology, and to transfer certain agencies and functions to such Department, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. MCCLELLAN, and Mr. ERVIN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

TELEVISION BOOSTER STATIONS

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the high cost of the original establishment of television stations precludes, generally speaking, their establishment in small communities. By the same token, smaller communities do not have the economic stature to sustain their own television stations. By way of illustration, at the end of 1958, only 325 communities had one or more local TV stations, as compared with 1,700 communities which have local radio stations. However, the demand for television is at least as great as that for radio.

In order to obtain the benefit of TV entertainment, small towns have joined together within their own communities in establishing some kind of repeater setups, mainly boosters. These repeaters, although considered by the Federal Communications Commission to be in violation of the Communications Act, have been permitted to go unchecked for the past 4 or 5 years. During this period of growth of booster stations, the people involved pooled their money and began to enjoy television—in effect coming to depend upon the booster setup for their televiewing.

The Federal Communications Commission has tried the licensing of translator stations. Operating on a maximum output of 10 watts, these stations would receive the signal of a commercial TV station on a VHF—very high frequency—channel, and would change or translate that signal to a UHF—ultra high frequency—channel, for rebroadcast. The translator stations require precision equipment, and are, once again, relatively expensive. To my knowledge, none is currently operating in Colorado. Across the country, translators are serving a total of less than half a million people.

Objection by the FCC to the boosters is based, in part, on their interference with nearby signals. Boosters are low powered—0.2 watt; and reports of interference by such low-powered transmissions are far outweighed by the reports of good reception and of viewer satisfaction.

In considering the situation purely from the standpoint of Colorado, a translator, being a UHF station, has certain drawbacks, not the least of which is the fact that the UHF signal emitted by a translator is prone to ricochet off mountain walls. This would present a very unsatisfactory signal—if, indeed, any signal at all—to the home viewer. At the same time, it would appear that the translator setup is at least one-third more expensive than that of the booster; and this does not take into consideration the investment already made by many persons in the booster equipment.

There is some indication that the FCC decision may very well cause an unnatural rise in the price of equipment necessary both to transmit and to receive the UHF signal. For example, on page 75 in the May 28, 1956 issue of Broadcasting Televising, $1,000 is quoted as the price of a translator. Mr. Clifford S. Kester, of Craig, Colo., inquired of the Adler Electronics, of New Rochelle, N.Y.; and in a letter dated July 13, 1958, a price of $2,750 was quoted as the cost of the translator, f.o.b. There are other evidences that the price is being jacked up as a result of the FCC decisions.

A comparison of booster and translator might be apropos at this point:

A translator is a small repeater station which receives a VHF-TV signal—channels 2 to 13—and translates that signal into a UHF frequency—channels 14 to 83. It then retransmits the VHF signal on the UHF frequency. The translator operates at a maximum authorized power of 10 watts.

A booster is a very low powered—two-tenths of a watt—repeater operation. It receives a VHF signal, and repeats that signal, often on the same channel that it is received on, that is, a VHF channel.

There is some merit to the recommendation by the FCC with regard to translator operation. There are more UHF channels which can be used to rebroadcast a signal. Second, with its increased power, coverage is likewise increased, and the picture received by the home viewer is in most cases a better one. Current booster operations are usually on a very local basis and the picture which they beam into the home is, at best, poor. However, the main point in this entire situation seems to be that the people who now are receiving booster—repeater—television want it to continue. I have received more than 1,000 communications from residents of Colorado who indicate this feeling.

The financial problem of the home owner is very great. If the boosters are converted to translator operation, it will cost a homeowner anywhere from $50 to $150 to get his own home set adapted to receive UHF. Moreover, it will require approximately $4,000 to convert the booster equipment transmitter itself from VHF to the required UHF frequencies. The magnitude of the problem is further enlarged when one considers the investments which already have been made by the people in setting up their community booster operations. Because of the many aspects of this raging controversy, the complete facts are difficult to obtain. The dissenting opinions in the decision of the Commission reflect that. I am not in a position to state that the decision of the Commission is wrong with respect to the installation of additional booster stations; but, Mr. President, I am completely convinced that the summary treatment of the problem by the Commission must be reconsidered. By its own inaction in the past years, the Commission has allowed this problem to develop. At the very least, these communities must be given time to work out a practical solution.

In a nutshell, our people in Colorado, as well as those all over the country who are now being served by boosters, are overwhelmingly opposed to this FCC decision.

Mr. President, many people have been permitted to depend upon this booster operation—persons who never before had television, and who now regard it as fondly as do the more sophisticated city dwellers. In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an excerpt from a letter from Frank F. Brown, of Summit County, Colo.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The people of Colorado in these remote areas have been without television for a long time. We finally found a method that would give us television at a low cost. We scraped here and there with donations and free labor and managed to get television. Now the FCC comes along and wants to take it from us.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, booster-operated television brings great educational benefits, present and potential, to the area covered. Vincent S. Lester, superintendent of schools at Cortez, Colo., explained this in a letter to me. I ask unanimous consent to have an excerpt from his letter printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My main concern is for the educational possibilities. We teachers have noted a distinct change in our students since [booster] TV was made available to us. The students are much better informed on current world problems.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, in the mountain areas, where oftentimes snow prevents people from getting around as much as they would like, booster-created television is a real boon. A letter from Purvis Vickers, of Lake City, Colo., points this out. I ask unanimous consent to have a portion of his letter printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I know that our own [booster] TV operation here above the ranch which serves Salt Lake City is very muchly needed, and I don't know how we'd get along without same. During these long winter months, it is indeed a pleasure to sit back and watch TV.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, much has been made about the interference of boosters with other forms of communication; but rare, indeed, are the examples of this. A letter from W. W. Bundy, superintendent of schools in Manitou Springs, Colo., tends to support this feeling. I ask that a portion of his letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A check with police officers in our area showed that they experienced no interference from the booster. It certainly is not in a position to interfere with air travel.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the matter of interference is further confirmed in a letter I received from Mayor Victor Meline, of Julesburg, Colo. The letter also gives an indication of the real financial problem facing these people. I ask unanimous consent that a portion of his letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Over 1,000 TV sets receive signals from the TV booster tower near Julesburg. Conversion from VHF to UHF would cost set owners and the community around $50,000. And the UHF transmission difficulties would make over 200 sets useless here.

We are obtaining confirmations from the local short-wave radio operators, radio stations, and TV stations that our tower causes no interference with their operations.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, another problem involving the conversion to UHF translators is outlined in a letter to me from a member of the Craig, Colo., TV Association, Mr. Clifford F. Kester. I ask unanimous consent that a portion of his letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection the excerpt from the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

UHF translators are operated at such high frequency it would be a very difficult problem to get signals down into communities that are surrounded by high mountain ranges, especially in cases where there are mountains between the translator and the community to be served, such as in northwest Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, civic groups are also deeply concerned. That fact is evidenced by telegrams which I have received from Aguilar and Walsh, Colo. I ask unanimous consent that the telegrams be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Please help our community keep the present TV booster station at this time. Regarding FCC ruling against low power booster stations—the town of Walsh is strictly opposed to this ruling. Letter will follow.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram which I have received from my hometown of Lamar, Colo. The telegram is signed by 148 persons.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We heartily support your stand of the recent FCC ruling on VHF boosters. We feel the order is highly discriminating and irresponsible. Twelve hundred families in Lamar depend on our VHF booster as their only source for television. Enforcement of this unjust ruling will render these sets absolutely useless.

Mr. ALLOTT. Indeed, Mr. President, the State of Colorado itself has declared its feeling in this matter, in a joint resolution of its legislature. On page 866 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 20, 1959, this memorial was reprinted.

Mr. President, because I believe that the public convenience and necessity and the interest of the persons affected must be served, particularly in the case of the residents of the sparsely populated States, where individual television stations cannot be set up, and where such service is a necessity, I therefore introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, and to lie on the desk for 2 days, in order that other interested Senators may join in sponsoring it. The joint resolution is introduced by me at this time on behalf of myself, the Senators from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT and Mr. CASE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Colorado, and be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) to direct the Federal Communications Commission to authorize for a certain period the operation of VHF television booster stations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. ALLOTT (for himself, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, and Mr. CHAVEZ), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there are many communities and farm areas whose people depend upon VHF television booster stations as their only means of receiving television programs; and

Whereas the terrain of many areas makes the use of ultra high frequency translator stations impractical, if indeed not impossible, according to the opinions expressed by competent and qualified broadcast engineers, as well as by certain members of the Federal Communications Commission; and

Whereas it is economically impossible for these communities and farm areas to support, construct, or operate any other form of duly authorized television service; and

Whereas there is ample proof that low power booster stations can be regulated so as to preclude interference with licensed television services or other services; and

Whereas in spite of continued efforts on the part of many States and communities therein to obtain authorization for VHF television booster stations the Federal Communications Commission has over an unreasonably long period of time refused to grant such authorization and did on December 31, 1958, order the termination of the operation of all such stations within ninety days, without, in the opinion of many experts in the field, adequate reason for such summary action: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal Communications Commission shall authorize such VHF television booster stations as were in operation on January 1, 1959, to continue operation until at least January 1, 1962, under such reasonable rules and regulations as the Commission may determine to be necessary.

SEC. 2. The Federal Communications Commission shall as soon as practicable make such recommendations to the Congress with respect to necessary amendments to the Federal Communications Act as the Commission may determine to be necessary in order to accelerate administrative determinations by the Commission under the provisions of such Act, and thereby avoid unnecessary public inconvenience and expense that may result from delayed administrative action on the part of the Commission.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Colorado for the introduction of the joint resolution, which deals with a problem which is important to a great many persons. In Nebraska there are several dozen communities in which people have raised funds for the construction of booster stations, as described by the Senator from Colorado. The proposed regulation by the Federal Communications Commission would take television away from them. In each instance, hundreds of homes are involved.

Mr. President, this problem is of such great magnitude that the Legislature of Nebraska has adopted Legislative Resolution No. 6, introduced by John G. Donner, of the 27th district; Earl Hollenbeck, of the 40th district; and Jack Romans, of the 29th district.

It was adopted unanimously. I have before me a copy of the resolution; and in support of these efforts to remedy this situation, I ask unanimous consent that the legislative resolution of the Legislature of Nebraska be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, under the rule, will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

Legislative Resolution 6

Whereas the Federal Communications Commission on December 31, 1958, announced a decision prohibiting the operation of low power television broadcaster repeater stations on very high frequency channels and requiring existing stations to apply for conversion to licensed ultra high frequency translators by April 1; and

Whereas the cost of conversion to an operation of ultra high frequency translators would be prohibitive in the sparsely settled areas in Nebraska; and

Whereas because of the distances involved in the sparsely settled areas of Nebraska the use of repeater stations on very high frequency channels does not interfere with licensed operations using the same channel: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the members of the Nebraska Legislature in 69th session assembled—

1. That this legislature respectfully requests the Federal Communications Commission to reconsider its decision of December 31 insofar as it applies to Nebraska and permit the continued operation of low power television repeater stations on very high frequency channels in this State;

2. That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Federal Communications Commission and to each of the Members from Nebraska in the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate.

DWIGHT W. BURNEY,
President of the Legislature.
HUGO F. SRB,
Clerk of the Legislature.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the distinguished Senator from Colorado that he will have my wholehearted support in this matter. I hope, before the actual enactment of legislation becomes necessary a satisfactory solution can be arrived at by the FCC; but it is important for them to realize that this is a problem of extreme magnitude: It involves the right of television for hundreds and thousands of persons who have proceeded entirely in good faith.

Mr. ALLOTT. The Senator is entirely correct, and I appreciate his remarks.

Mr. MUNDT subsequently said: Mr. President, as one of the coauthors of the joint resolution introduced today by the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], I wish to say a few words in support of the resolution, and to encourage prompt action upon it.

By the very nature of the television industry, this is a service which has denied direct reception to a great many smaller communities of this country. As a consequence, a network of booster stations has developed, which gives very serviceable and very adequate reception. However, the Federal Communications Commission has issued a 90-day order to force these communities to within 3 months to desist from utilizing such booster stations, or to force them to apply for a much more expensive and complicated kind of system. This action has caused a great amount of consternation throughout rural America, Mr. President.

There is considerable controversy among the members of the Federal Communications Commission themselves as to the wisdom of this order. One of the Commissioners, Mr. Craven, an experienced engineer, has stated categorically that these booster stations can be regulated and can be utilized without interference and that the cease and desist order is unwarranted.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the 90-day order should be promptly rescinded, to give an opportunity for Congress to consider this matter and to give an opportunity for these communities to continue to enjoy the type of reception being used.

Interestingly enough, Mr. President, the situation is so urgent that it has become the matter of first attention of the South Dakota State Legislature insofar as the attempt to memorialize Congress is concerned. In a joint resolution presented to the South Dakota Legislature, it is asked that Congress intercede in regard to the Federal Communications Commission ruling against booster stations. This is a bipartisan resolution, introduced jointly by two distinguished Republican members of the legislature and two distinguished Democratic members of the legislature.

Mr. President, it seems to me the commissions in Washington should recognize that rural America also is entitled to some consideration. Simply because rural America is enjoying a television service which does not quite fit the pattern of the Federal Communications Commission, there certainly is no justification for an arrogant order telling these people that in 90 days they have to "put up or shut up." I think the Commission in Washington D.C., should immediately rescind the order and give notice to rural America within the week that the people are going to be entitled to enjoy television reception, and that methods can be developed so that this TV reception can be something they can permanently enjoy.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Aberdeen American-News, reporting on the action of the South Dakota State Legislature.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BLACK HILLS TV BILL IS INTRODUCED

PIERRE.—The television habits of Black Hills viewers were the subject of another measure prepared for consideration.

It was a joint resolution asking Congress to intercede in a Federal Communications Commission ruling against booster stations.

The Commission has ordered that within 90 days after the first of the year, such booster stations—there are eight in the Black Hills—must convert from very high frequency (VHF) to ultra high frequency (UHF).

The resolution would ask that this requirement be scrapped.

Norm Heffron, representing KOTA-TV, Rapid City, said the FCC order would work a severe hardship on the booster station. These were established as separate commercial enterprises in the Hills to pick TV programs off the air and rebroadcast them as a means of thwarting the difficulties of transmitting throughout the rough hills terrain.

The FCC requirement, he said, would mean each set owner would be required to buy HF conversion units for their sets and owners of booster station operations would have to replace their equipment with the more expensive UHF facilities.

The measure was prepared in the senate by Al Roesler, Republican, Deadwood, and Art Jones, Democrat, Britton, and in the house by James Jelbert, Republican, Spearfish, and Carl Furchner, Democrat, Plankinton.

LEIF ERICKSON DAY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution which requests the President to proclaim October 9 of each year to be Leif Erickson Day. This proclamation would honor the brave Norse explorer whose expedition to North America about the year 1000 was a thrilling event in the history of Western civilization, and an inspiring milestone in the development of our continent and our Nation.

A Presidential proclamation would be an entirely appropriate means of recognizing the importance of the discoveries of Leif Erickson and the other Norsemen who followed him to the North American Continent. It would be a dramatic and effective means of reminding all Americans of the heritage we have received from these early explorers, and from the generations of Nordic peoples who followed them to these shores in the centuries that have followed.

Leif Erickson Day is an anniversary that all Americans should recognize with pride for the adventure and accomplishment which it symbolizes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 27) requesting the President to proclaim October 9, as Leif Erickson Day, introduced by Mr. PROXMIRE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STUDY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution to establish a commission to study and make recommendations for the prevention of claims against the United States or the citizens thereof and for the security and protection of American foreign investments. I ask unanimous consent that a memorandum prepared by me relating to the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 28) to establish a commission to study and make recommendations for the prevention of claims against the United States or the citizens thereof and for the security and protection of American foreign investments, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MEMORANDUM BY SENATOR JOHNSTON OF SOUTH CAROLINA

GENERAL

Recent reports of the Secretary of Commerce indicate that American enterprise, small and large, has private investments in foreign countries of the world approximating $30 billion. Almost $10 billion of this amount is in Latin American countries. All Americans have investments in our hundreds of national defense installations throughout the world in excess of $6 billion. Our national defense costs since the close of World War II are averaging $40 billion annually. The aggregate costs of our foreign-aid programs since the close of hostilities now exceed $71 billion. The United States is on the threshold of further and continuing costs for the defense of the free world.

These enormous investments—private and governmental—create a vast reservoir of potential claims against the United States. The Congress through some instrumentality should make a detailed study specifically directed to devising and recommending ways and means for the safeguarding and security of these investments, thereby preventing or diminishing the potential of claims against the United States whether such claims are founded in law or based upon the Government's moral obligation to its citizens. Treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation seem inadequate. Such treaties result from favorable climates already created, rather than are they directed to creating favorable conditions for the protection of foreign investments. An interdependent world economy demands a uniform system of rules and regulations for the security and stability of lawfully acquired rights.

NECESSITY FOR STUDY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

There is an increasing demand on the part of those engaged in foreign commerce and capital investments that the United States take positive and affirmative action to protect these investments from expropriation or interdiction. Treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation now exist. Whether these should be expanded and supplemental undertakings should be explored and recommended, requires special study and analyses involving the domestic laws of nations, and regulations and practices among nations in the field of international law. Studies are in progress by the American and other bar associations.

Lack of uniformity with respect to the protection of investments jeopardizes them, disturbs the peace of the world, and provokes international discord which results in hostilities with untold damage to the spiritual, human, and material values involved.

Pronouncements of the National Foreign Trade Council, representing as it does every phase of American foreign investments, accentuate the problems. Among the declarations adopted by the council at a recent meeting were the following:

"Sanctity of contract: The convention holds that maintenance of the principle of sanctity of contract is fundamental to the whole process of international trade and investment. Without sanctity of contract there can be no respect for private property rights, and no reliance upon agreements made between nation and nation, or between nations and private parties, or between the private parties themselves.

"The deterioration of respect for solemnly undertaken obligations has spread dangerously since the Second World War. As each lapse is condoned on grounds of expediency, others will occur. It is our responsibility as a member of the world community not to condone any deviation from the principles of integrity which are inherent in the concept of property rights and which are, in consequence, essential to the achievement of world security and world economic advancement. The convention holds that no country in which a proper recognition of the sancity of contract is lacking can be a healthy or useful part of a free world.

"Proprietary rights: The convention holds that the international trade and investment essential to the economic development of nations demands respect for an effective protection of proprietary rights.

"Private industry has, in general, been responsible for the development and compilation of the technical industrial information required for the successful application of modern manufacturing processes. The dissemination of such information is usually based on contractual relationships, and the benefits derived from such dissemination are dependent upon the faithful observance of the terms of the contracts.

"The convention holds that technical industrial information is entitled to protection as effective as that accorded to any other property right, and it believes that economic development will be enhanced in those nations which provide the necessary protection."

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, whose members reflect the views and recommendations of every segment of American business in every geographical area, in its declaration of policy respecting the protection of foreign investments declared that a "vigorous policy should be pursued against any measures of foreign countries which are hostile to or discriminate against American investors or investments. Assurances are needed of a fair and nondiscriminatory treatment for existing and future investments. Pledges should be sought from foreign nations against expropriation of property of investors without prompt, adequate, and effective compensation. Agreements made within the general legal framework or in the form of specific contracts should be honored fully in letter and spirit. Modifications should be by mutual consent. This is of special importance when governments are parties to agreements or partners in enterprises. Adequate safeguards for existing investments and for encouragement of a continued flow of new capital would increase the produetivity of recipient countries and keep open the channels of private enterprise."

Treaties, collective agreements or governmental insurance through the International Cooperation Administration, or private insurance companies, under existing world conditions appear insufficient, thus necessitating a closer study and scrutiny if the protection demanded by business and government is afforded.

OBJECTS AND PURPOSES

This resolution has for its primary purpose two principal objectives, (a) the prevention of claims against the United States, and (b) the security and protection of our foreign investments—both private and governmental.

The questions immediately arise: (a) What have we done? (b) What are we doing? (c) What more may we do to insure the protection and security of our private and governmental investments abroad and thereby prevent the assertion of moral or legal claims against our Government? Existing claims against the United States now total over $300 million as a result of World War II. The potential of all claims is unknown. These known claims remain unsatisfied and present problems for an early solution by the Congress.

Studies concentrated upon and directed exclusively to these two principal objectives should be undertaken without delay by a bipartisan commission established for such purposes.

Studies have been made of our foreign economic policy by the commission created in the 83d Congress. The commission was known as the Randall Commission. That Commission restricted its activities and report in the main to economic factors in the development of foreign commerce with observations on the creation of favorable climates and legal environment for private investments abroad. No positive declarations or formulas for the protection of existing or the ever-expanding foreign investments, or protection against claims the United States, were made. The broad field for the protection of investments, the prevention of claims, the potential of losses from interdiction, nationalization, expropriation, or confiscation needs immediate study, exploration, and recommendations for corrective consideration. Ways and means ought to be developed for the security of the Government as a whole and for private industry in particular. To that end a commission with representatives from industry and Government should be established to make such special studies and be charged with responsibilities of recommending protective measures for the consideration of the Congress and the executive branch of the Government.

As was observed by the Commission on Foreign Economic Policy:

"The Government can and should give full diplomatic support to the acceptance and understanding abroad of the principles underlying the creation of a climate conducive to private foreign investment. This requires better coordination of policy and action by the various U.S. agencies and representatives in the field of foreign economic policy, and in particular, a clear formulation of the Government's position with respect to private investment abroad, stressing support of the private enterprise system and the interests of U.S. investors.

"To some extent the general climate and legal environment for private investment may also be improved through the negotiation of international treaties relating to foreign investment. Although it must be recognized that such treaties more often record the existence of a favorable climate than create it, the discussions which take place in the attempt of two governments to reach agreement may in themselves be beneficial. The U.S. Government should continue to use the treaty approach to establish common rules on the fair treatment of foreign investment. Negotiations should be undertaken first with like-minded countries, and gradually be extended as additional countries become convinced of the desirability of a friendly attitude toward private enterprise.

"The U.S. Government also can remove uncertainties in its own policies which affect foreign investment."

As a result of the foregoing observations something more than our usual commercial treaties and agreements is essential. Concrete proposals are necessary. Studies should be undertaken without delay looking toward the establishment of a collective form of agreement or a uniform business code founded upon ethical rules of trade and commerce for the protection of business and industry—large and small. The feasibility of establishing such a uniform international code relating to all business, trade, investments of capital and commercial transactions should be specifically examined and reported upon by the Commission. Governmental inducements to private citizens and corporate entities to trade in foreign enterprises make it imperative that such inducements be accompanied by adequate safeguards for such investments thus made. The President in his message to the 43d National Trade Convention said:

"Security and prosperity are promoted by foreign trade and investment. This theme of yours is central to the foreign policy of our Government. In recent years there has been a significant expansion of world trade and investment. This is now threatened from many sides but we must continue in our efforts to strengthen the climate of confidence in which trade between nations can flourish for the well-being of all."

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 contains a brief statement of fact concerning existing potential claims against the United States as related to foreign investments and the policies of our Government toward the same; the need for the establishment of a uniform international code regulating and protecting investments of capital, goods and services, private as well as governmental, coincident with and beyond the normal scope of treaties of friendship, commerce, and navigation is made evident from governmental policies and world conditions.

Section 2 follows the pattern heretofore set by the Congress in establishing bipartisan commissions and provides for the designation of 15 members, 5 to be appointed by the President, 5 by the Vice President, and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Provision is made for representation on the Commission from industry, the Senate and House of Representatives. The possible conflict of interests statutes are removed so that the Commission may be constituted from groups or individuals directly concerned with and affected by the studies and recommendations of the Commission.

Section 3 eliminates from compensation the Members of Congress or employees of the executive branch of Government who may be designated to serve as members of the Commission, with a maximum $50 per diem compensation for those designated who are not in Government. Travel, subsistence and other necessary expenses of members of the Commission incurred in the performance of the prescribed duties are to be paid.

Section 4 empowers the Commission to appoint and fix the compensation of its temporary personnel without regard to the Classification Act of 1949.

Section 5: The duties of the Commission to examine, study and investigate the actual and potential liabilities of the United States for claims assertable against the United States with recommendations for appropriate policies, measures and practices for the prevention of claims and the security of American investments abroad are specifically detailed. The Commission will be charged with determining the advisability, desirability or necessity for the establishment of a Uniform Code of Regulations to which the nations of the free world may subscribe for the security and protection of foreign commerce and investments against nationalization or confiscation; and, further, the Commission is charged with submitting to the President and the Congress drafts or recommended submissions for such a code.

Section 6: Authority is granted the Commission and its members to hold hearings and take testimony in pursuit of the authorized functions of the Commission. The executive agencies of the Government are authorized and directed to cooperate with the Commission in the administration or execution of its functions.

Section 7 provides for the authorization for appropriations.

Section 8 provides that the report of the Commission be made 90 days after the commencement of the 2d regular session of the 86th Congress, and a termination of its activities 90 days following such a report.

CONCLUSION

Studies are being made by the American, national, and international bar groups and societies and various business associations directly affected. They may well be coordinated and supplemented by official studies of the Congress and executive branch of the Government. The United States has too large a stake in the promotion of trade, the security of our investments already made, and the peace of the world to fail to assume a fair share of the pressing responsibilities thus entailed.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT, RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX, AND RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON] and my colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], may be added as additional cosponsors to the bill (S. 226) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, introduced by me on January 12, 1959, the next time it is printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENFORCEMENT OF STATE STATUTES PRESCRIBING CRIMINAL PENALTIES FOR SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 294) to amend title 18, United States Code, to authorize the enforcement of State statutes prescribing criminal penalties for subversive activities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF FEDERAL AIR POLLUTION CONTROL ACT — ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 441) to extend the duration of the Federal air pollution control law, and for other purposes, introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], for himself and Mr. ENGLE, on January 17, 1959.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO CULTURAL AFFAIRS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 446) to amend the International Cultural Exchange and Trade Fair Participation Act of 1956 to authorize the President to provide for participation by foreign governments and citizens of other countries in cultural and other activities in the United States, and for other purposes, introduced by me on January 17, 1959.

AMENDMENT OF EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on January 17, 1959, I introduced a bill to amend the Employment Act of 1946, which bears the number S. 497. Three Senators have subsequently asked that their names be added as cosponsors of the bill. The bill has already been printed. However, I ask unanimous consent that on the next printing of the bill, should there be one, the names of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] be entered as cosponsors.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL, 1959—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have my name added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 505) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), on January 20, 1959.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED ITEM VETO POWER—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT] be added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 1, proposing an item veto power, when the concurrent resolution is next printed or reported.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF RESOLUTION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] may be added as cosponsors of the resolution (S. Res. 19) to amend the standing rules of the Senate relating to standing committees, submitted by me on January 12, 1959, the next time it is printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the bill (S. 492) to repeal the act requiring the filing of certain information with respect to trade between the United States and its noncontiguous territory, introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], on January 17, 1959, was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The matter with which this bill deals is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Finance. For that reason, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE PROCLAMATION

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, each January 22 marks an anniversary that is symbolic of all human history, for this date is at once a testimony to man's aspirations toward great moral goals and a stark reminder of the world's failure to persevere in attaining these goals.

Forty-one years ago on January 22, the Ukrainian people proclaimed their independence, thus breaking the shackles of centuries of foreign domination. We can well imagine their hopes and dreams as they embarked on what they thought would be a new era of peaceful progress.

But we know of the tragic end of those hopes, for the Ukrainians were destined to become the first victims of the horror of Communist aggression. Their lot was to be, not freedom and independence, but mass murder, planned famine, purges, and mass deportations.

There were some in the world who voiced outrage at the atrocities committed in the Ukraine, and who saw the dread portents which these crimes held for the whole family of man. But the general response of free men was feeble and ineffective, and has continued so for decades.

The day that was meant to represent independence and rebirth serves now to remind us of the perpetuation of injustice and to mark the passing of another year of subjugation for 40 million Ukrainians.

Why, then, do we note this day each year?

We do so in order to combat an even greater enemy than Communist tyranny; namely, the indifference of free men to the suffering and enslavement of others, and the complacency which accepts an injustice, however monstrous, as legitimate and lawful if only it is continued long enough.

That is why each year at this time we urge upon just men everywhere the case of the imprisoned millions of the Ukraine, of their inalienable rights to freedom and independence, and of their determination to regain those rights.

We again serve notice that our people and our Government will never accept their enslavement as a permanent fact of history; and we remind the world that true peace will never be achieved so long as this Communist warfare continues against the peoples behind the Iron Curtain.

And, humbled by our impotence in the face of so great a tragedy, we offer prayers that, through the grace of God, the Ukrainian people will be supported through their long night of darkness by faith in the ultimate triumph of His moral law.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, yesterday, January 22, was the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine.

This aniversary is a timely reminder of the fact that some 40 million Ukrainians, enslaved by their Communist overlords in Moscow, retain the spirit of the freedom they once enjoyed and look to the day when they, along with many millions of other captive peoples, shall once again breathe the air of liberty.

The observance of this anniversary is particularly appropriate in view of the fact that, just the other day, a much-noted Soviet visitor to the United States finally departed our shores.

It is well to recall that it was Anastas Mikoyan who shipped grains abroad from the Ukraine while millions of Ukrainians starved to death during the manmade famine of the 1930's. Let no one forget, in contemplating Moscow's current campaign of smiles and trade, that millions of enslaved peoples and millions of brutally murdered victims lie behind the Communist facade.

Let all of us rededicate ourselves to a sustained faith in the eventual liberation of all nations enslaved by imperialist Moscow. Let the Mikoyans, the Menshikovs, and the Khrushchevs know that American memories of their crimes, and our own standards of civilized decency and justice, cannot be erased by their calculated attempts at genteel antics, nor by their spurious promises with respect to international trade.

Only 2 months ago, before the Moscow City Soviet, Anastas Mikoyan delivered a violent anti-American speech. Thousands of Armenians, Azerbaijani, Don and Kuban Cossacks were annihilated by his orders in 1917 to 1921.

Let no one forget these events. And as we observe this important anniversary in the history of the Ukrainians let us pledge anew our best efforts, our support, to the end that once again the Ukrainians and all Soviet-enslaved peoples shall be free once more.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, we have seen this week the departure of the Deputy Premier of the Soviet Union, Anastas I. Mikoyan. His visit is still causing much analysis and interpretation elsewhere. I shall not attempt to add to this analysis. I would, however, like to note that yesterday, January 22, was the anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, one of the captive nations of the U.S.S.R. In the hearts of 40 million Ukrainians, there must be some remembrance today of the free lives they had before the day of Soviet domination. Freedom, once tasted, cannot be forgotten. It is our duty in this free land to join with those who yearn for its return in nations robbed of their national right to govern themselves.

I should like to paraphrase from a letter sent to me by the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America. The committee said that the observance of Ukrainian Independence Day will serve notice of sustained faith in the eventual liberation of all nations enslaved by imperialist Moscow. The letter said that the observance will clearly demonstrate to the Menshikovs, Mikoyans, and Khrushchevs that American memories of their crimes and our standards of civilized decency and justice cannot be erased by calculated genteel antics or by the spurious promises of trade.

It adds:

The reception given Mr. Mikoyan by some of our wealthy Americans is food for serious thought. It indicates the spiritual climate in some quarters. Twenty years ago, the Nazi, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, was completely ignored for what he represented. Today, despite his personal crimes, the Armenian quisling is widely feted. The thousands of patriotic Armenians, Azerbaijani, Don and Kuban Cossacks who were annihilated by his orders in 1917–21; the millions of Ukrainians who starved to death in the manmade famine of the thirties while Mikoyan shipped grains abroad; the role he played in the liquidation of Hungarian patriots—these and other facts no longer seem to bestir the consciences of some of us. Only 2 months ago, before the Moscow City Soviet, Mikoyan delivered a violent anti-American speech; today, without self-respect, some accept him as a deliverer of peace.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, yesterday, Thursday, January 22, occurred the 41st anniversary of the proclamation which declared the Ukraine to be a free and independent Republic. I regret the Senate was not in session at that time in order that we might have joined then with friends of freedom throughout the world in observance of that occasion.

It is important that we express our faith in the eventual liberation of 40 million Ukrainians and of all captive peoples who have been enslaved by Communist imperialism.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a joint resolution introduced by by myself and the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] may be printed in the RECORD following these brief remarks, together with a letter I have received from Lev E. Dobriansky, of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc., in which he eloquently expresses the feeling of many Americans of Ukrainian descent; also an editorial entitled "Ukrainians Mark Independence Day," published in the Hartford (Conn.) Courant of January 22, 1959.

There being no objection, the joint resolution, letter, and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 20

Joint resolution authorizing the President to issue a proclamation designating January 22 of each year as Ukrainian Independence Day

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating January 22 of each year (the anniversary of the proclamation which declared the Ukraine to be a free and independent republic) as Ukrainian Independence Day, and inviting the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies.

UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMITTEE OF AMERICA, INC.,
New York, N.Y., January 14, 1959.

Senator PRESCOTT BUSH,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BUSH: On Thursday, January 22, friends of freedom everywhere will be observing the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. In the profound faith that Moscow's deceitful campaign of "smiles and trade" could never cause you to forget the aspirations of the captive nations and their fundamental importance to the security of our Nation, we respectfully ask that you join with us in this observance.

Today, more so than in years past, your statement on the floor and in the RECORD, commemorating this event, will help enormously to keep the spirit of freedom alive in the hearts of 40 million Ukrainians. Your message in behalf of this captive nation will serve notice, too, of your sustained faith in the eventual liberation of all nations enslaved by imperialist Moscow. It will also clearly demonstrate to the Menshikovs, Mikoyans, and Khrushchevs that American memories of their crimes and our standards of civilized decency and justice cannot be erased by their calculated genteel antics or by spurious promises of trade.

The reception given Mr. Mikoyan by some of our wealthy Americans is food for serious thought. It indicates the spiritual climate in some quarters. Twenty years ago, the Nazi, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, was completely ignored for what he represented. Today, despite his personal crimes, the Armenian quisling is widely feted. The thousands of patriotic Armenians, Azerbaijani, Don and Kuban Cossacks who were annihilated by his orders in 1917–21; the millions of Ukrainians who starved to death in the manmade famine of the thirties, while Mikoyan shipped grains abroad; the role he played in the liquidation of Hungarian patriots—these and other facts no longer seem to bestir the consciences of some of us. Only 2 months ago, before the Moscow City Soviet, Mikoyan delivered a violent anti-American speech; today, without self-respect, some accept him as a deliverer of peace.

Your message on the captive nation of Ukraine will be greatly appreciated as a message with an American conscience, not to say one of political sagacity. We shall be most grateful for it and, in gratitude, shall deliver to you this Friday an interesting brochure on Ukraine's quest for freedom.

Sincerely yours,

LEV E. DOBRIANSKY,
Georgetown University.

UKRAINIANS MARK INDEPENDENCE DAY

Memories of Soviet barbarism in crushing the Hungarian revolt are still fresh in every mind, and naturally should be. At the same time it is equally important to remember that other independent nationalities have been similarly stamped out by the forces of communism. One of these is the Ukraine National Republic, whose scattered citizens and their children everywhere observe January 22 as Independence Day. For it was on this date in 1918, or 41 years ago, that Ukrainian independence was proclaimed at Kiev. And it was 40 years ago that the Act of Union became effective, uniting Western Ukraine with the Ukrainian National Republic.

As the official statement by Governor Ribicoff points out, Ukrainian independence lived only briefly before it was battered into the ground by Soviet Communist might. Ukraine historians report that, during the last 40 years, all precedents in cruelty and misrule during the centuries-old martydom of the Ukrainians were surpassed under the Russians. They declare that mass murder and the genocidal policies of the Red rulers of the Ukraine have exacted a toll well over 10 million lives. The Soviet-fostered famine in the thirties alone is estimated to have resulted in death for 6 million persons.

But it is the vow of Ukrainian people that, despite all subjection and persecution, they will continue to fight until the Ukraine National Republic is resurrected. Residents of Connecticut as well as freedom-loving people everywhere will salute them on their Independence Day, and wish them courage and success.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on January 22, 1918, a Ukrainian national council at Kiev proclaimed the independence of Ukraine. After centuries of subjugation by the Mongol hordes and the Russian czars, the dream of a proud, free, and independent Ukrainian National Republic was then realized. But it was a short-lived dream. In 1920, the Republic was destroyed by Russian Communists and today the Ukraine, largest of the captive non-Russian nations in Eastern Europe, is still under the totalitarian imperialism of the Kremlin.

Time after time events have strongly demonstrated that the nationalist disturbances created by the Ukrainians and other Soviet-dominated peoples are positive indications of the inherent weakness of Soviet satellite domination.

It is my fervent hope that the day will soon come when the brave and freedom-loving people of the Ukraine can once again reclaim their freedom from the long bitter years of Russian oppression and regain their rightful position in the family of free nations.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, January 22 marked the 41st anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, an independence which the Soviet Communists destroyed in 1920.

Since that time Ukrainians have rebelled against their masters but repeatedly these revolts were put down with bloody reprisals. It was the Soviet Ukrainian troops in Hungary who refused to fight the Hungarian rebels in 1956 and in many instances turned over their arms to them.

Today some 40 million Ukrainians—including the 2 million in the free world—still have not forgotten and yearn for their national identity. All Americans join in wishing that they and the other captive peoples of the Communist empire may soon be again free and independent members of the family of nations.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, beginning yesterday and probably continuing for another week in many metropolitan areas of the United States people will be assembled commemorating the 41st anniversary of the establishment of the independence of the Ukrainian nation. In those services people will be singing the songs of Ukrainia and narrations will be made of the heroic deeds of Ukrainians who, for a period of 1,000 years, have been devoted to the cause of freedom. When mention is made on the Senate floor paying tribute to a people at this critical period in the history of the world, it becomes exceedingly significant to remember that today, when the voice of Ukrainia is speaking, it is the voice of a liberty-loving people praying to brother-mankind, and to the Lord for emancipation from the despotism to which these people have been subjected.

The Ukrainian people number 40 million and to the core there are no greater devotees of freedom than these noble Slavs. They speak the voice of the oppressed colonial nations in Europe and they form a part of more than 200 million people in Eastern and Middle Eastern Europe who are waiting for the day when they will be able to stand up and strike from their hands and wrists the shackles which the Communists have imposed upon them.

I, as a Member of the United States Senate, while we are speaking of missiles and of their significance, want to invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that in the final analysis the battle with communism will have to be won through the heroism of these men who believe in our cause.

Today, figuratively, I want to place a wreath upon the tomb of those thousands of Ukrainians who have gone to their deaths for our cause. I join with the Ukrainians in the United States, and Ukrainians everywhere, in giving thanks to those heroic people, and join in prayer that the day of their emancipation will soon be at hand.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE THOMAS S. GORDON, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to have the RECORD note that this week the Honorable Thomas S. Gordon, of Chicago, Ill., passed away.

He served for 14 years in the House of Representatives. It was my honor to serve with him. For two terms he was chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

He was certainly one of the gentlest people I ever knew. As I think of him I am reminded of the great and enduring prayer of St. Francis of Assisi, in which he supplicated Providence that he might understand, rather than be understood, and that he might bring comfort, rather than be comforted. That was certainly the nature of Tom Gordon. I join his many friends who mourn his passing.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Illinois in paying tribute to the memory of Tom Gordon. I knew him well and served with him many years on the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He was certainly a devoted patriot. He had all the aspects of spirit and sweetness of disposition which the Senator from Illinois has mentioned so effectively. I join in extending my sympathies to his survivors.

RESOLUTION OF OREGON CHAPTER OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POSTMASTERS OF UNITED STATES PROTESTING DISCONTINUANCE OF THIRD- AND FOURTH-CLASS POST OFFICES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in the past 6 years I have received evidence of an increasing amount of concern regarding the discontinuance of third- and fourth-class post offices. Not all of the concern and complaints come from patrons of these offices; many come from post office personnel. On January 18, the Oregon chapter of the National Association of Postmasters of the United States sent to me a resolution adopted by it on July 10, 1958, in Medford, protesting the discontinuance of third- and fourth-class offices without adequate safeguards for employees. I wish to submit the resolution for the consideration of my colleagues, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Post Office Department has announced a policy that small post offices would not be discontinued unless a vacancy in the postmastership should exist due to the death or retirement of the postmaster; and

Whereas a number of post offices of the third and fourth class in Oregon have been discontinued or are in the process of being discontinued prior to the time the postmaster is eligible for retirement or the office is otherwise vacant: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon chapter of the National Association of Postmasters request the Post Office Department to review its policy and reaffirm its stand to safeguard the position of the postmasters of the small offices; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the two Senators and four Congressmen from Oregon, as well as to the Postmaster General and the officials of the National Association of Postmasters.

NEEDED AT HELLS CANYON: A NEW PLAN FOR THE FUTURE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on November 22, 1958, I addressed the National Hells Canyon Dam Association meeting at Portland, Oreg., on the subject, "Needed at Hells Canyon: A New Plan for the Future."

I ask unanimous consent that my address, without my taking the time to read it, be printed at this point as a part of my remarks.

I urge my colleagues from the Pacific Northwest to read my speech, because I understand that there was some misconception at a meeting of legislative representatives from the Northwest the other day as to the position of the senior Senator from Oregon in regard to this great unsettled problem of the Pacific Northwest. I stand on the speech I made at that association meeting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEEDED AT HELLS CANYON: A NEW PLAN FOR THE FUTURE

It is good to join with you at this National Hells Canyon Association meeting. If we all could get $1 for each and every hour worked on behalf of the high dam during the past decade by the leaders and members of the association, we probably would have enough money to build the dam.

Hells Canyon is not only the name of a Pacific Northwest project; it is also a national symbol of the battle between full resource development in the public interest and inadequate, wasteful underdevelopment for profit by a private utility in order to maintain a monopoly grip upon a whole State.

This project did not just happen. The self-sacrifices of hundreds of private citizens and the unremitting work of a relative handful of elected officials made it happen. We could not have made it happen unless the facts were on our side.

The clear superiority of the high Hells Canyon Dam over the small Idaho Power Co. dams was so obvious that, once we brought the facts of the people—first in the Pacific Northwest and then nationwide—the verdict was ours. And, you know, I'm something of an expert on verdicts.

But, allow me to go back a few years to review the history of this struggle, because it is very pertinent to what I feel should be done in the future.

The Hells Canyon proposal grew out of the historic 1948 report of the Army engineers. The prospect of a great multipurpose dam on the middle Snake River spurred the Idaho Power Co. into a proposal for one small, single purpose, low head dam at Oxbow, where it had had a 600-kilowatt generator since 1916. But it took the proposal of a Federal dam to interest the private utility in developing the site—even inadequately.

A friendly Federal administration with a friendly Secretary of the Interior and devoted staffs at the Bureau of Reclamation in Boise and Bonneville Power Administration in Portland, carried the program forward step by step. It was slow, careful work. The opposition did not seem formidable nor ready to fight. The power company kept delaying the FPC hearings on its Oxbow application.

HIGH DAM BILL INTRODUCED

The bill for the high dam was not ready for introduction until 1952, and I, joined by a few other Senators, introduced it. It was late in the session and little could be done on such a major project. But hearings were held in the House committee.

It was not until the 1952 election campaign was under way that it became clear that the private utility lobby had not been asleep nor idle. It had been wide awake and working. It had a presidential candidate who knew nothing about the work of Army engineers beyond a Bailey bridge. He denounced the Federal power program which had meant so much to the development of the Pacific Northwest.

That was one of the major reasons for my decision to leave the Republican Party—that is a decision that was in the interest of Oregon, our region and the Nation—I have never regretted it.

But the people were reluctant to recognize that the kindly general could actually be antagontistic to a program that had been so successful. Many of you were alarmed and anxious, but your numbers had not yet become large enough.

Soon after the new Congress convened, President Truman again recommended authorization of the high Hells Canyon Dam in his budget. Harry S. Truman has been a great friend of conservation and of this region, and we shall always honor him for that.

The Hells Canyon bill was revised in 1953. There was no change in its substance, but its form was modified to make it clear beyond all doubt that upstream water users' rights would be protected. It took a while to do this job and assemble the data for a major speech introducing the bill. There was not a great deal of interest in the measure—but I found a few more cosponsors for the bill.

The majority leader, Bob Taft, told me that the Senate would meet but not transact business on April 16, 1953. So, while almost every Senator went to watch the opening baseball game, I stood on the floor of the U.S. Senate for 4 hours, putting the case for high Hells Canyon into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I had little company. The press paid only a little attention.

ADMINISTRATION WEIGHT THROWN AGAINST HIGH DAM

Secretary of Agriculture Benson had already withdrawn his Department's opposition to Idaho Power Co.'s small dam application—even before it was changed to a paper three-dam plan. The private electric utility signal flags were up.

What the Interior Department would do was considered decisive. My lengthy, detailed, factual speech was designed to flush the Secretary out into the open.

On May 5, 1953, the Secretary of Interior made an announcement indicating beyond the shadow of a doubt that his Department and the administration were walking out on the job of protecting the people's interest in full development at Hells Canyon. He withdrew the Department's opposition to the Idaho Power Co. applications, before the application was amended to add two inadequate dams.

The announcement came on May 5, 1953, the day the Senate—with its new Republican majority—voted favorably on the submerged oil lands giveaway bill. The people of our Nation were truly doublecrossed on that day.

That was supposed to end the fight. In June of 1953, hearings before the FPC—now manned by a new chairman opposed to Hells Canyon—were to begin without anyone to put in the case for the high dam.

The Hells Canyon Dam was dead; that was the general consensus of opinion among those who knew. But these self-appointed experts failed to reckon with an aroused citizenry that arose to protect the public interest, the National Hells Canyon Association. It grew out of the small tri-State citizens' groups formed by stalwarts Jim Marr, Elmer McClure, Owen Hurd, Al Ullman, Sam Fretwell, Vince Cleaveland, George Taylor, Gus Norwood, Harley Libbey, Frank Stewart, Kirby Billingsley, Henry Carstensen, Ed Weston, Lloyd Tupling, John George, Ken Billington, Lars Nelson, Byron Brinton, Jack Travis, Joan Baker, Lee Wooden, Joe DeWuhs, Jebbie Davidson, Evelyn Cooper, and many others all over the Pacific Northwest, who got together and formed a spunky grassroots organization the likes of which hasn't been seen since the Grange movement first took on the railroads.

If Hells Canyon were dead, they didn't know it, and because they would not let the high dam die, it has not died. You and hundreds and thousands of allies in rural electric co-ops, power districts, granges, Farmers' Union locals, businessmen's groups, and the Democratic Party, wouldn't give up.

VOTERS RESPOND TO HIGH DAM ISSUE

The association fought for the high dam before the FPC and at the grassroots. A few of us in Congress kept battling away. At first there were not many of us. GRACIE PFOST was practically alone in the House. I had the help of MAGNUSON and JACKSON in the Senate—with assists from great friends such as MURRAY, of Montana, ANDERSON, of New Mexico, KEFAUVER, of Tennesse, and Lehman, of New York.

In the 1954 Pacific Northwest elections Hells Canyon was a major issue. Mrs. PFOST was reelected. DICK NEUBERGER and Mrs. GREEN scored upset victories in Oregon. AL ULLMAN and CHARLIE PORTER came close.

The battle before the FPC and in Congress continued through 1955 and and 1956.

Remember: Even then, we were not given a chance of winning.

But we fought on. In 1955 field hearings were held in Idaho, Washington, and Oregon—and it was clear that so far as the people were concerned, Hells Canyon was more vital than ever. We began to break into the national press. I kept pouring it on in Senate speeches and at banquets, conventions, church meetings—wherever and whenever I could. People began to learn about the tragic, impending waste at the Hells Canyon site.

Solid Republican opposition and one Democratic opponent kept the bill bottled up in the Senate Interior Committee. We couldn't bring it to the floor—and its opponents said Hells Canyon was dead.

But in 1956 we did bring it to the Senate floor to the consternation of the gravediggers manning the editorial typewriters in Portland, Boise, and Spokane—the same lineup which opposed Grand Coulee in the thirties.

We came within 10 votes of putting it across—even though in the summer of 1955 the FPC—in a decision which is spotted and pitted with misstatements, half-truths, and distortions—had granted Idaho Power Co. the licenses it sought. But because we lost on that occasion, the refrain rose again: "Hells Canyon is dead."

But you didn't think so—I didn't think so—and in the 1956 elections it was again a major issue. MAGNUSON demolished Langlie, an arch opponent of Hells Canyon, in Washington. With your help, I finished off the man who let himself be used as Secretary of Interior to rob the Pacific Northwest of its greatest damsite.

AL ULLMAN—Mr. Hells Canyon—won his congressional seat. CHARLIE PORTER—always a stanch Hells Canyon supporter, won also. Both defeated opponents of Hells Canyon.

FRANK CHURCH, in Idaho, beat Senator Welker, an opponent of Hells Canyon, and Mrs. PFOST had easy sailing.

The result was similar in State legislative races.

"But," cried the critics, "it's too late. Hells Canyon is lost."

It was far from lost. We still had our committee problems, this time primarily in the House. It took time to bring the Hells Canyon bill to the floor of the U.S. Senate. We were often advised not to do it. We would only suffer a humiliating defeat, said the pessimists.

FIRST MAJOR HELLS CANYON VICTORY ACHIEVED IN 1957

But we stuck to our guns.

When the quick tax writeoff certificates were granted by the administration to the Idaho Power Co. for its small dams over the active protests of over 20 Senators and Congressmen, Senator KEFAUVER went to work in response to our requests.

His hearings showed that the company and the administration misrepresented the facts when they told the people that the company dams would be built at no expense to the taxpayers. As the hearings started I compared the Eisenhower administration's stealing from the taxpayers to subsidize Idaho power with Dave Beck's dipping into the pockets of members of the Teamsters Union. This was considered indelicate, bad taste. But it was true—and eventually the people recognized it as true. I'm quite used to taking abuse from many segments of the one-party press which delights in serving the people its emotional brew. Fortunately, those who swallow this brew usually reach a stage of sober reflection. They did with respect to Hells Canyon.

With the help of the Democratic leadership of the Senate, we got ready for the floor debate and vote in 1957. Defeat was predicted. But, friends gathered in Washington; Elmer McClure and Lars Nelson camped on senatorial doorsteps; mail and telegrams flowed in. If we were to die, we were going to do it with our boots on.

But we won. High Hells Canyon won in the Senate in 1957. All the smart editorialists and "play-it-safers" were wrong. Those of us who were too stubborn to know we were licked won. We made headlines across the Nation—more and more people heard our story and believed in our cause—that of full resource development and conservation.

We ran into trouble in the House. Solid Republican opposition with White House prompting—and two or three Democrats—blocked the path to a vote on the merits in the House. We lost that round.

But we worked away. We did not give up.

HELLS CANYON WAS AN ISSUE IN CAMPAIGN AFTER CAMPAIGN IN 1958

Even in 1957, BILL PROXMIRE, of Wisconsin, made it a major issue in the campaign which led to his upset victory over an opponent of high Hells Canyon.

After the Senate vote, Senator Watkins, of Utah, was so concerned at the bad reaction in his State that he got out an 8-page special newsletter in which he tried to explain his stand. He was defeated on November 4.

Opponents of the House Republicans who had blocked the bill in committee made Hells Canyon a major issue.

What were some of the results?

Thirteen Senators who opposed the Hells Canyon bill are no longer in the Senate; 10 were defeated and the other 3 didn't run for reelection. Another Senator who only paired for it was defeated and was replaced by a supporter—EUGENE MCCARTHY, of Minnesota.

It is not too much to expect that in another vote on Hells Canyon some of the opponents of 1957 might turn tail, if we have a feasible plan.

The architect of the House committee defeat of Hells Canyon was himself defeated in Nebraska. His colleague from that State on that committee had a close call, and has announced that he is leaving the House Interior Committee. One Democratic opponent from the South did not run for reelection.

Many newly elected Democrats in the House used the Hells Canyon issue in their campaigns. By virtue of Democratic successes throughout the country, the margin of members who are favorable to projects such as Hells Canyon on the Interior Committee and in the House itself should be quite encouraging.

The supporters of full resource development in Congress are stronger than at any other time in a decade—and possibly more.

Why have I gone into such a lengthy review of the history of our struggle? There is a lesson to be learned: We haven't quit before in the face of heavy odds.

Now that our forces in Congress are strong it is no time to quit. The high dam has been pronounced dead by its critics time and again. But it will stay alive so long as it remains superior to the Idaho Power Co. dams in terms of multipurpose development.

THE PRESENT HELLS CANYON SITUATION

In considering what we should do—or advocate be done—we must first ascertain what can be done.

The Idaho Power Co. has not been diligent or efficient during the more than 3 years since it was handed its licenses by the Federal Power Commission.

It has bungled repeatedly. Despite its mistakes, the company has managed to bring Brownlee to near completion. Because of its blunders, it has not gotten very far with the second dam, Oxbow. Little Hells Canyon is hardly a gleam in its dazed gaze.

While there is some dispute about the matter, the likelihood is that the Idaho Power Co. would have to be compensated for the flooding of Brownlee Dam and perhaps part of Oxbow. The precise measure of damages would be a question for negotiation or possibly court determination. It is inconceivable that the public would be charged for the company's mistakes which have taken the costs much higher than original estimates, I am informed.

You know, the private utility line used to be that only the inefficient government underestimated costs of dams; they hardly dared admit it when efficiency caused the lowering of Federal dam building costs a few years ago. There are some red faces in Boise, Augusta, and Wall Street now.

But, we must take the situation as it is. Due to the bias and favoritism of the Eisenhower administration and its handpicked Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, the cost of condemning Brownlee and possibly as much of Oxbow as has been completed would probably have to be added to the total cost of the high Hells Canyon Dam. It is a tribute to the superb productive power of the high dam that it is even a question whether—with the probable added costs of paying off Idaho Power—its benefit-cost ratio would be favorable.

I do not know the answer. I hope the answer is: "Yes, the benefit-cost ratio would be favorable." Everything must be done to find out the answer. And if it is favorable, we must go full steam ahead to congressional authorization of Hells Canyon.

I believe the Hells Canyon proponents have the proper approach which has been studied and in general approved in our region. I believe it merits immediately being brought up to date.

THE BESSEY PLAN

Some preliminary work has been done. Roy Bessey, a faithful friend and stalwart worker for full resource development, has done an analysis of the situation which is promising.

It calls for operation of Brownlee by the United States for a period of about 10 years during which the high Hells Canyon Dam would be constructed. The revenue from power sales to Idaho Power, at cost to the company plus 3 percent interest would go a long way toward offsetting the cost of acquiring Brownlee.

It has been reported that Brownlee construction costs have been higher than estimated by the company and the Federal Power Commission. Some costs—such as inefficient fish diversion facilities—which were due to mistakes by the company should not be chargeable to the public. You will recall also the flooded cofferdams during the winter of 1957.

Surely the mammoth blunder involving the washout of fish facilities and cofferdams at Oxbow this past Labor Day must be the responsibility of the private utility.

The actual expenditures made by the company must be ascertained, and I have asked the FPC for these figures. An analysis of the costs which would be required under public condemnation added to the construction costs of Hells Canyon itself must be made. Then the benefit-to-cost ratio must be derived.

If the benefit-to-cost ratio remains favorable, we must renew our all-out efforts to achieve authorization of a high Federal dam at Hells Canyon.

THE NORWOOD PLAN

In addition to the Bessey plan, a specific, two-stage proposal has been drafted by Gus Norwood and circulated among those of us concerned. The Norwood plan is also deserving of the most careful study by the Hells Canyon Association.

If, after thorough study and consideration, the recommendations of the experts in the Hells Canyon Association are that economically feasible, full, comprehensive development of Hells Canyon would be accomplished by either the Bessey plan, the Norwood plan, or by a combination or variation of them, you will have my full cooperation in seeking approval by Congress.

THE CONTINUED DESIRABILITY OF HIGH HELLS CANYON

The high dam at Hells Canyon is still the keystone of full development of the Snake and Columbia River Basins.

Why? Because it holds the best prospect for economic large-scale water storage, for flood control and downstream power production.

WATER STORAGE—FLOOD CONTROL, ELECTRIC POWER AND ATOMIC POWER

Throughout history population has followed the river valleys. Our country and our region are not exceptions. The flood plains of the Snake and the Columbia Rivers are areas of population concentration; the concentration of people and manmade wealth will become greater with time. Those lines and that property must be protected and it is the duty of the Federal Government to provide that protection from navigable streams. A flood such as the one which threatened in 1955 could be far more costly than the whole Hells Canyon Dam.

We shall need larger and larger blocks of low cost electric power if our region is to grow.

We need the water storage facilities which flood control and power require. And if we have them we shall insure that development of atomic electric power will take place first within our region.

When the Atomic Energy Commission reported on the feasibility of an atomic electric power experimental plant at Hanford it stressed the fact that atomic power is most feasible where there are large water storage facilities and power dams.

This is so because atomic generators are subject to outages, especially in the present and foreseeable state of technology. A standby of vast water storage and dams means that in a matter of moments the water can be released to produce peaking power and make up for the atomic outage until it is fixed. When it is fixed, the reservoirs are slowly filled to be on guard for the next crisis.

Only if we expand our water storage facilities will we retain this competitive advantage. If we lose that advantage we shall very likely sacrifice the region's best hope for full economic development in the atomic age which is at hand.

WATER STORAGE—WHERE?

Where are we to find water storage? Negotiations with Canada on sharing the advantages of water stored behind its borders are deadlocked. We should press for a resolution of these difficulties, but it will be a long while before they are solved. Libby Dam has been a possibility which has been stymied by misunderstandings with Canada.

Paradise Dam has been an attractive possibility. But high costs of land acquisition have led the Corps of Engineers to study an alternative at Knowles site, a few miles upstream, which does not provide as much storage or other benefits, but eliminates much of the relocation difficulty.

The FPC has found that in the Middle Snake, Nez Perce is the best adapted to a comprehensive plan of development.

As I indicated to the association's annual meeting in 1956, I am for seeking a solution to the fish passage problems at Nez Perce. But that will take time, several years at best, before even a start could be contemplated. So Nez Perce is a potentiality. The site should be preserved for full development until these problems are worked out.

The FPC determination has, for the foreseeable future, eliminated proposed alternatives at Mount Sheep and Pleasant Valley. The FPC has turned them down. (If it had used the same criteria at Hells Canyon we would not have the present problem.)

The corps has been pushing Bruce's Eddy and Penny Cliffs. Bruce's Eddy is partially authorized. Conservationist opposition to it continues and understandably so. It is not going to move ahead very fast—and in any event its storage is a drop in the bucket.

Penny Cliffs has even stronger conservationist opposition—and I shall continue to oppose it until there are satisfactory solutions for the fish and game problems.

I do not believe it either possible or desirable to initiate dams on the Salmon River at this time.

Whatever road we take in the search for upstream water storage, the signs all point to the Hells Canyon site as the best and the most immediately available.

Its 4 million acre-feet of storage are irreplaceable. We have seen the truth of that demonstrated over the past 6 years.

Because high Hells Canyon remains so desirable, all doubts on feasibility should be resolved in its favor.

And there is a moral account to square as well. The rape of this resource should not go unremedied. It should not be permitted to be successful.

We cannot punish the power company, nor do I seek to. The Eisenhower administration has taken its lumps at the polls.

What we can do is retrieve the loss to resource development, economic development, and the people of this region—by wiping out the inadequate dams and building the high dam.

Not only is this sound economics. Not only is this sound resource policy. Hells Canyon would stand as a symbol that resource looting will not be tolerated.

So, I call upon you, I call upon the people of Oregon and its neighboring States, I call upon the Senators and Representatives of the Pacific Northwest States to stand fast until we explore every possibility for salvaging the people's interest at Hells Canyon.

In the past, the Democrats in the Pacific Northwest delegations have been able to meet, debate, and arrive at common policies on Hells Canyon. If we could do that in adversity, we should be able to do it with such an improved congressional climate.

If we have a feasible plan, our colleagues will support us. If our plan is questionable, we should not put it forward.

But now is the time to run up the signal: Hells Canyon is not dead.

We are not ready to quit.

We can hold our forces together if that is the message we offer our region and our friends across the Nation—because they number in the tens of thousands.

CONSERVATIONISTS' STAKES AT HELLS CANYON

The National Hells Canyon Association need not be reminded that proper resource development requires a multipurpose approach which seeks the maximum utility of a resource (a river basin) for all potential purposes.

There are of course frequent conflicts between possible uses, and they must be resolved. This need not result in sacrificing one value to another, if reasonable methods can be employed to serve both purposes.

The potential conflicts between the flood control, power, and navigation benefits of dams, on the one hand, and sport and commercial fishing, on the other, have been with us for some time.

I think a new era of understanding and cooperation has been achieved. Today public power and conservation groups meet, consider each other's views and seek to harmonize those views. I am proud that I took a part in shaping that cooperative effort.

Conservationists—and especially fishermen and wildlife enthusiasts—know that a high dam at Hells Canyon would serve the interests they cherish in two main ways.

A high dam at Hells Canyon would have the least adverse effect upon fish, and indeed would provide what one editor of Sports Afield called a fisherman's paradise. Its lake would provide an outdoor recreational area with unique rugged scenery. The Idaho power dams offer little in the field of recreation.

Equally important, by providing a large amount of vital water storage, construction of Hells Canyon would take the pressure off for dam construction at sites such as Penny Cliffs on the Clearwater, or sites below on the Salmon River.

That time can be used to explore means of solving fish passage problems, elk winter feeding problems and the other outdoor resource preservation problems attendant upon dams like Nez Perce and Penny Cliffs.

An aggressive program of study should be undertaken; whether completely satisfactory solutions can be achieved, I do not know. But time is precious; the job should get under way.

Meanwhile the interests of conservationists would be best served by the building of a high dam at Hells Canyon.

Experience shows that the Idaho Power Co. has been irresponsible in this field.

The Oxbow fish fiasco is a recent case in point. The company in its slipshod manner sought to anchor its fish facilities to old concrete. It gave way and necessitated shutting off the flow of the Snake River by Idaho Power according to corps of Idaho officials.

In the process navigation was hurt and thousands of migrating fish killed and endangered.

Little wonder that the Idaho Fish Commission censured the power company, Morrison-Knudsen, and the FPC.

The incident is typical of the company's disregard of public interests in its headlong, headstrong insistence upon maintaining its monopoly position.

THE FARMERS' STAKE IN HIGH HELLS CANYON

As we know, the high Hells Canyon Dam has found strong allies in the farmers of the West and Midwest. The farmers realize that their hopes for high-concentrate phosphate fertilizers at reasonable costs are closely related to maximum development of the Hells Canyon site. They know that the use of low-cost Hells Canyon power for electric furnace processing of the phosphate rock now found in abundance in Idaho, Utah, and Montana would be the best method of converting low-grade phosphorus deposits into high analysis fertilizers.

The experts agree with the farmers concerning the need for cheap power for fertilizer production. For example, the Manager of the Tennessee Valley Authority said recently:

"As you undoubtedly know, the largest phosphate deposits in the United States are located in the three-State area of Idaho, Montana, and Utah. TVA development of the electric-furnace process for smelting phosphate ore has stimulated the development of the western phosphate industry and the use of these ores.

"The electric-furnace process is particularly well suited for use in the West because there are large potential sources of electric power in that area and because the electric-furnace process can process lower grade ores than can be economically processed by other methods.

"One of the major obstacles to the use of the western phosphate ores for the manufacture of fertilizers is the high cost of transporting either phosphate rock or conventional low-analysis phosphate fertilizers from the West to the large established markets in other parts of the country. Production of concentrated fertilizers or concentrated materials used in the manufacture of fertilizers is one way of overcoming this obstacle.

"* * * We believe it is reasonable to assume that the need for higher analysis fertilizers will result in the use of new processes for the production of the more concentrated liquid and solid materials from superphosphoric acid in the West, and that this use will depend considerably on the extent to which low-cost power is available in the western phosphate field."

Farmers of today and of the future have a mighty important stake in the high Hells Canyon Dam. Our job is to continue to give them the facts; they will join us in the fight for the high Hells Canyon Dam in ever increasing numbers.

THE ROLE OF THE NATIONAL HELLS CANYON ASSOCIATION

Come what may, this association has achieved a unique status, not only in our region but nationally as well.

It has become recognized as a reliable spokesman for the public interest in resource development.

We hope that the outlook for the Hells Canyon Dam itself is good. I pray that it will be.

But if it is not we will have to be realistic when the facts are clear. What should the association do?

For my part, I hope and I urge it to keep going. Its name is a badge of honor here and throughout the Nation. It and the facilities and lines of communication built up during this struggle can be used in resource battles which surely lie ahead.

Do not disband. Do not be discouraged. You have already won great victories and there are challenges ahead.

ELEMENTS OF A RESOURCE PROGRAM, THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST

It was not quite 2 years ago that I met with you to discuss a resource program for our region.

The essentials of that program remain good guides for future action; progress has been good during the past 2 years. The composition of the new Congress seems promising.

A few of those essentials should be emphasized at this time:

(1) Full multipurpose development of the Columbia River Basin remains a valid and necessary goal.

(2) The major, keystone projects must be built as rapidly as possible and great sites, such as at Paradise and Nez Perce, should not be sacrificed to underdevelopment.

(3) Upstream storage remains a key to proper multipurpose development, as I have indicated.

(4) The principles of integration of electric generating and transmission facilities, and the postage stamp rate, must be maintained.

(5) The basic principle of public agency preference in the interests of domestic and rural consumers must be maintained.

With Vince Cleaveland—and all of you for that matter—I believe that the solution to preference allocation problems is adequate supply.

The defeat in Oregon of the power referendum means that a State power program must be fashioned. Consideration should be given to the establishment of a State agency which not only would have preference rights itself, but which would market power in accordance with the public preference principle. This agency could also allocate large blocks of low-cost power to industry and insure adequate supplies to Oregon consumers if a pinch should develop in the next decade.

(6) Flood control and power on the smaller rivers of Oregon should be pressed forward. Remarkable progress has been achieved at Green Peter, Cougar, Hills Creek, and Holley. We must do more on the Rogue, Yamhill, and the other rivers where floods threaten.

(7) Atomic energy for power—first for experiments and then as an integral part of an atomic-hydro system should be pressed. Herein lies our hope for a continuation of our resource advantage to offset disadvantages of freight rates and lack of raw materials. The Hanford dual purpose reactor program should be carried forward. If Hanford generates as much as 380,000 kilowatts it will relieve the current substantial drain on current sources—and, indeed, contribute a sizable net gain.

(8) Seek aggressively for solutions to fish and wildlife problems so as to best serve all the presently competing interests in the resource field.

CAPITAL BUDGET

One of the most serious obstacles to securing adequate funds from the Congress for resource development is the problem of making a clear distinction between Federal appropriations for normal governmental operations and Federal appropriations for revenue-producing investments, such as multipurpose projects. In order to make this important distinction between the two types of Federal appropriations, I have introduced a bill in the Senate which provides for capital budgeting. I believe this bill is urgently needed, and if adopted, it would provide one of the most important advancements ever made in our Federal Government appropriations process.

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

An important first step toward capital budgeting can be achieved through the Columbia River Development Corp. legislation. Two years ago, I called for the introduction of such a bill so that we might have hearings on it. The proposal, which was prepared by the Northwest Public Power Association, deserved to be offered so that it could be reviewed thoroughly by legislative committee staffs and by competent Government and non-Government witnesses.

I cosponsored it for this purpose; I believe the hearings already concluded and those still to be held will make it possible to work out a bill which will merit the approval of Congress.

Certainly we cannot continue to permit piecemeal, partial development of the Columbia such as has occurred thus far in the Hells Canyon stretch. The regional corporation bill will make available a source of capital for comprehensive development of the Columbia Basin, development that can be orderly and timely.

The regional corporation bill will be as beneficial to the private power companies as it will be to local public agencies and rural electric co-ops. Scare words from the power companies should fool no one. They have cried "wolf" before, with respect to practically all the multipurpose projects in this area; yet, they as well as the people here have benefited from their construction.

Here is an outline of an affirmative, progressive program. I want your comments, your suggestions, your criticism. I believe it is a sound program, but I always welcome improvements.

BASIN HAS SURVIVED MAJOR THREAT

During the past 5½ years the Columbia Basin resource program has been threatened by a combination of forces which almost crippled it.

Despite the setbacks at Hells Canyon, support and belief in the program, and the program itself, have survived. Indeed, they have been refined in the ordeal.

Better times can lie ahead. We must continue to plan together and pull together.

We have a lot of building to do in the Pacific Northwest.

We must pool our intellectual skill, our knowledge, and our experience to the end of working out the best possible basinwide development of the water resources of the Pacific Northwest. By so doing, we can carry out a sound power program that will make it possible for us to use the power generated by both private and public facilities for the interest of all the people of this area. And we will thereby enlarge the economic might of the whole American Nation.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I speak as a member of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and as chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Health, Education, Welfare, and Safety. I speak in defense of what I think is a very restrained, but exceedingly sound, joint statement published in this morning's Washington Post and Times Herald. The statement was made by Mr. Walter N. Tobriner, President of the Board of Education, and by Mr. Hansen, Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia, in answer to what I consider to be a completely irresponsible statement in regard to District of Columbia schools made by the Governor of Virginia in his speech the other night.

As a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. President, I do not think I could possibly remain silent in the face of that unwarranted attack on the District of Columbia, on its inhabitants, and particularly on the schoolchildren of this District. I commend the coauthors of the statement for their reply to the Governor of Virginia, and I ask unanimous consent that the reply be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF TOBRINER-HANSEN STATEMENT

The text of the joint statement of Walter N. Tobriner, President, Board of Education and Carl F. Hansen, Superintendent of Schools, commenting on remarks by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., on the District of Columbia public schools:

The basic objective of our school system is to secure and improve the educational opportunities for the children who enter the schools of the District of Columbia.

Because of this concern for the children here, entanglements with political issues in other jurisdictions have been studiously avoided despite great provocation to the contrary.

It is impossible, however, to ignore the following statement made by Gov. J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., of Virginia, on Tuesday, January 20, 1959 "* * * to those who defend or close their eyes to the livid stench of sadism, sex, immorality, and juvenile pregnancy infesting the mixed schools of the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

This statement is a gratuitous and intemperate attack upon the innate decency of 114,000 children and youth in our public schools. It maligns the parents and teachers of those children.

It challenges the integrity of the citizens of this great city—a city of church people, of family-minded citizens—of people of the highest moral principles, generous, and concerned—Americans unwilling to stand by while children are in want of physical and moral help.

CONDEMNS MANY

It condemns the many for the misfortunes and the deviations of the few. It implies that conditions relative to morality among some children are peculiar to Washington and cannot be found in other cities as well, whether segregated or integrated.

It subjects to profound indignity and unprovoked assault a public school system that is dedicated to the educational improvement of all the children in accordance with the highest ideals of democracy.

It inaccurately implies that "immorality and juvenile pregnancies" result from attendance in racially integrated schools, rather than, when they do occur, from community conditions, social and economic blights, and possibly from a lack of educational backgrounds, conditions which are far too general in our national community.

It neglects to point out that the schools seek to eliminate, so far as they can, the causes of human degradation, and that for many children the system of public education is their only chance for improvement.

STANDARDS LIFTED

Since 1954 the District schools have been successful in improving academic standards on a citywide basis on most levels, though much remains to be done to overcome cultural deficiencies in many homes.

They have achieved national notice for the ability grouping program instituted here. They have demonstrated the capacity to educate the bright student to levels far above the national average. (Four hundred and eighty pupils whose achievements in reading and mathematics average three and two and four-tenths grades, respectively, above national norms are presently in the seventh-grade honor courses.)

They have introduced basic curriculums, with an expansion of remedial work, for the educationally retarded pupils.

They have a continually improving program for the maladjusted, the needy, the delinquency-prone child, though many more resources are needed to get to the heart of these problems.

They have, in all the adjustment necessary to desegregation, experienced a minimum of disciplinary problems, though many needs in this area are still to be met.

The statement ignores a basic fact: that the public school system of the District of Columbia is an outstanding example of how education serves to improve citizenship, thus demonstrating the value of public education to the community and the Nation.

In frankly assessing its educational problems, the District schools have proved that a direct and open attack upon problems of educational and moral retardation is better than a policy of ignoring and secreting such problems.

It is regrettable that the foregoing statement has been considered necessary. The intention is not to involve the school system in the concerns of another political jurisdiction. The intention is, rather, to inform Governor Almond that his statement concerning the schools is unjustified, that he does not understand the significance of the school program here, and that, further, the degrading effect of such commentary places a burden upon the children and teachers in our school system to provide a maximum educational opportunity for every child according to his needs and abilities.

TRANSFER OF SENIORITY ON THE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], temporarily listed as the ranking minority member of the Senate Armed Services Committee during the 86th Congress. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] is presently second ranking minority member of the committee.

I also ask that this in no way affect my seniority rights or my permanent status as the ranking member on the committee, and that at the end of the 86th Congress I resume my correct position as ranking minority member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

I realize that this is an unusual procedure, but this privilege was granted during the past two Congresses, and it is my desire to have the same procedure followed during the 86th Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, what was the request? I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask unanimous consent that I be privileged to waive my seniority with respect to service on the Armed Services Committee for the 86th Congress to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] and that I resume seniority at the conclusion of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I submit a letter from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] expressing his appreciation, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
January 22, 1959.

Hon. STYLES BRIDGES,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR STYLES: In view of the fact that I will not be able to be present at the session on Friday, I want to take this occasion to thank you for your courtesy in permitting me to again be the ranking minority member of the Armed Services Committee.

You and I have worked on this committee for many years, and I appreciate the opportunity for this service.

I hope that when you ask unanimous consent of the Senate to make this change you will insert this letter in the RECORD with your request.

With kind personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

LEVERETT SALTONSTALL,
U.S. Senator.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GOLDWATER

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on January 22 the very able and distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] delivered an address before the Traffic Club of Pittsburgh, Pa. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR BARRY GOLDWATER, REPUBLICAN OF ARIZONA, BEFORE THE TRAFFIC CLUB, PITTSBURGH, PA., THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1959

Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege to speak today, in this great steel city, before such a distinguished group of men. For you are the men whose efficient use of steel, in transportation, laid the real basis for our great American economy.

We, in Arizona, have always been especially grateful to the railroad builders. It was the coming of the railroads to the frontier territory now called Arizona that was the turning point in that whole area. My State would not be today the thriving, fast-moving community it is, had it not been for the energy of the steelmen of Pittsburgh, and the irrepressible enterprise of the railroad pioneers. Together they forged and then set in place the steel ribbons that tie Arizona into the Union.

But times have changed. The kind of adventurous enterprise which could accomplish such tasks is now almost entirely forbidden by Federal law. It has become almost a crime in the United States to accomplish such wonders. Today the great railroads, like Gulliver, in Swift's famous tale, are enmeshed in a network of minute regulations and restrictions. On all sides there are multitudes of little bureaucrats busily engaged in tying new strings on the giant railroad industry.

There was a day when the adventurous enterprise of the railroad men was greeted by politicians with applause, with celebrations, and enthusiastic praise. When a new railroad came to a frontier town, everyone knew the future had arrived.

Many years ago there was such a celebration in Tucson. It was a big day. The mayor declared a public holiday. In a burst of enthusiasm, he sent messages to the railroad president and to leading political figures in Washington announcing the arrival of the railroad in the Arizona Territory.

Because of the great part Catholic workmen had played in the building of the railroad, the mayor decided to send a message also to the Pope. A Tucson citizen intercepted that message to the Pope before it reached the railroad telegraph office, and he himself wrote a reply which was returned to the mayor. That evening at the banquet, the mayor was reading the answers he had received from various dignitaries. When he came to the message, supposedly an answer from the Pope, he read it aloud to those present. The message expressed the usual good wishes and congratulations, and then ended with a somewhat puzzling sentence, and I quote, "But where in the hell is Arizona?"

Well, gentlemen, Arizona is on the map today. No one is puzzled about its location. Steel and railroads made of steel helped to put her there.

And the State is more like heaven than hell, to most people. If Arizona is not heaven, it must be the last stop this side of heaven.

Every time I go home, I wonder why I ever took on a job that takes me out of the State for months at a time.

Yes, the State of Arizona steadily becomes a greater place to live, and our economy is growing more swiftly than any other State in the Union.

Yet, I wonder, sometimes, what Arizona would be if the pioneers had been confined within the network of government regulations we know today.

Would the free-wheeling railroad men have been able to reach Arizona in the 19th century, if they had been operating under the deadweight of present-day regulations? I doubt that it could have been done.

Where high mountains and swift rivers could not stop the railroads, this mountain of red tape and this army of bureaucrats could have stopped them.

What can be done to take this load off the backs of the railroads? What can be done to restore a measure of freedom to railroad enterprise? This is a question of vital importance not just to the railroads but for the Nation as a whole.

The Transportation Act of 1958 should bring some relief. The intent of Congress is clear; some of the deadweight of restriction and regulation must be taken off the backs of the railroads. Congress is clear on this point. The 1958 act may not be the answer, but it is a good beginning.

Bureaucratic delays must not be allowed to slow down the application of the provisions of this act. There must be a swift response, commensurate with the pressing needs of the situation.

There is need, furthermore, for new action beyond the scope of the 1958 act. The deterioration of rail plant which has taken place must be reversed. I believe such improvement in plant may be brought about most expeditiously by allowing faster depreciation for tax purposes of improvements to the rail plant.

It is not my purpose to review here today the various types of relief which must be brought to the railroads to restore their economic health and enterprise. But I do say, with utmost conviction, that this problem should remain a foremost consideration of the Congress.

For about 100 years the railroads have been basic in the American economy. In peace or in war, it is not possible for a modern economy to function without the railroads. I do not believe Americans, bedazzled by the achievements of the new technology, will forget such a fundamental economic truth.

The fact is, some of the most dramatic developments of American life are taking place within the railroad sector of our economic life. Some of these developments are not even primarily economic or technical.

I am speaking now of certain problems in the field of labor relations. I do not refer to problems of wages or working conditions.

I am referring instead to problems which have arisen in the field of labor relations but which go to the very heart of our free system of government, problems which are not economic, but political. These problems involve, in a very fundamental way, the central problems of individual freedom and personal responsibility.

We have become used to hearing many kinds of problems described in exaggerated terms. Professional propagandists have so often used the sacred idea of personal freedom to promote some cheap and insignificant cause that many, I am afraid, are becoming skeptical and callous when the warning is sounded that freedom may be at stake.

There are times and there are places, nonetheless, where there is a genuine and substantial threat to our basic freedom. I believe that such a genuine threat exists now in the labor relations field, and this threat involves the whole American community; the threat deeply involves citizens, indeed, who have never heard of labor relations, or labor relations problems.

The core of the problem, I believe, lies in compulsory unionism—what labor relations people refer to as the closed shop or union shop. This, as you all know so well is the idea that a man may be prohibited from using his skill to earn a living for himself and his family unless he joins a labor union, pays dues to the union, and submits to the discipline and power of the union officials.

In Arizona, the citizens of the State have declared such a condition of labor to be intolerable, and have passed a law forbidding such labor contracts. And 18 other States have passed similar right-to-work laws. The State of Kansas was added to the list just last November.

Now, the Taft-Hartley law specifically provides that the citizens of any State may forbid, through State legislation, such coercion of labor. Only in the case of one industry has Congress overridden the wishes of the citizens of the States and imposed the union shop or closed shop against the wishes of the local citizens.

The railroad industry was singled out in 1951 for this distinction. And in 1956, in the Hanson case, the Supreme Court upheld this questionable distinction.

You railroad men are certainly a privileged group.

I have been speaking of the closed shop, or compulsory unionism, but it is not the closed shop alone which so threatens the basic freedom of the citizens of the United States. The closed shop, or compulsory unionism, is a dangerous enough restriction on freedom, but the deadliest danger lies in a subtle extension of compulsory unionism into the political area. I am talking about the regular deduction from a man's pay for political purposes. The union member, on pain of dismissal from his job, is, in effect, required to sign a blank political check for the union leader. The union official then disposes of the worker's money in such political campaigns as he, the union official, sees fit.

There is nothing to stop the union official from using the member's own money to support political candidates which the union member himself opposes. In other words, that union member may go down to the polls and vote for a candidate who is, at the same time, being opposed by the union leader; but the union leader is nullifying to a degree the franchise of such a union member by requiring him to contribute money which the union official can then use against his chosen candidate.

Now, we have heard a great deal from the self-styled liberals about the restrictions on voting in certain regions of this country. And there is no question that such restrictions constitute a genuine and serious problem. But I ask these same liberals for a little honesty. Let them look at the degradation of a whole class of voters in the industrialized North. Let them view with the same alarm the nullification, or the diminishing, of the franchise of a northern union member who may be compelled to pay to support the campaign of a political candidate whom he himself would vote against.

Which is worse: to prevent a man from voting, or, on the other hand, to let him vote but compel him, at the same time, to supply political funds which may be used against his chosen candidate?

I invite the self-styled liberals to examine this situation. Although many of these liberals have been the beneficiaries of very large sums of money and purchased political help from union politicians, I feel sure that some of them are men of some integrity. Their willingness to face this very real civil rights problem will be a measure of that integrity.

There are millions, yes; millions of union members in this country today who are making forced political contributions on pain of losing their jobs.

They are the new second-class citizens in America.

They are the citizens whom we, by law, have turned over not only to the economic but to the political mercies of a small group of union politicians.

This is a new serfdom, where a citizen is required to surrender a portion of his freedom of political choice to a union politician or be discharged from his job on the grounds of failure to pay his dues.

We have heard much talk of civil rights just recently. And I am firmly convinced that the civil rights problems which have been so discussed are, and should be, matters of deep concern to every citizen.

I say civil rights is not the problem of only one region in this country.

Nor is civil rights only a matter of color.

There is a deadly civil rights problem in the North.

Yes, I shall begin to have more respect for some of the vociferous liberals of this country when they begin to examine with the same intensity the degradation of the political rights of workers in the North that they expend on the problem of the South. One is no less important than the other. Through the closed shop and the compulsory political contribution there is being created, I repeat, a whole class of second-class citizens in this country.

You may be interested in the story of a man, an underground miner from Negaunee, Mich., who came all the way to Washington at his own expense, several years ago, to ask for help.

I remember his name very well. It was Bridgeman. He was an angry man, angry enough to pay for a train fare he could ill afford. And he was courageous. He dared to fight men in the union who have the power to destroy his right to make a living.

This is the story he told, and I think it is worth your hearing in his own words; I am quoting his testimony:

"My name is Clarence Bridgeman of Marquette, Mich. I welcome this opportunity to relate a personal experience during the 1954 fall elections campaign which I consider to be a violation of my personal political freedoms. This violation occurred when I was a Republican candidate for county clerk for Marquette County, Mich.

"From 1950 to 1954, I was an underground mine worker for the Negaunee Mine Co., at Negaunee, Mich. I joined the United Steel Workers of America when first contacted by union representatives after starting my employment.

"Naturally, when I became a candidate for county clerk on the Republican ticket, I approached the acting president of my local to talk over my candidacy. I was told in clear language that I was running on the wrong ticket. This happened on at least two occasions.

"My union leadership came out openly and strongly for the entire Democrat slate. To me this meant my own union was opposing my candidacy on the Republican ticket and, more important, that a part of the union dues which I had to pay in order to keep my job covered were being used in the Democrat campaign against me. It put me in the position of practically contributing money to my opponent's campaign and to all the opponents of my fellow candidates.

"I believe this is a violation of my rights as an individual American citizen. That is why I have turned to Senator CURTIS and Senator GOLDWATER."

Now, gentlemen, this miner is not unique. I have thousands, yes thousands of letters from union members in this country who are keenly aware of this problem.

This is not a partisan matter. It happens that Bridgeman was a Republican. But let us look for a moment at a Democrat primary. There are large areas in this country where winning the Democrat primary is tantamount to election.

There are even a few places left where winning the Republican primary is tantamount to election. But there haven't been many Republican areas like that, recently.

Now the union politicians are just as active in the primaries as in the general election. Such is the case, especially in the South.

What then of the union member who is a Democrat and who votes in the Democrat primary for the candidate he wishes to represent him only to find that his dues money and the dues money of his fellow members have been put behind another Democrat candidate whom the union leader prefers?

This doesn't happen only in the South. It happened in the State of Arizona—in the last election. It happens all over the country.

In the Democrat primary in Arizona last summer, the national unions, with headquarters in Washington, came into Arizona to oppose one of the most distinguished Democrats in the State, a man chosen by the Arizona Democratic Party as their national committeeman.

Now there is no doubt whatsoever that many Arizona union members who are Democrats favored their national committeeman to be senatorial candidate. Their own money, along with that of fellow union members was thrown into the contest in such quantity that their votes were nullified by the top union politicians. The national committeeman of the Democrat Party in Arizona was successfully purged from the senatorial race by the national union politicians. The national committeeman publicly ascribed his defeat to these outside forces. The union's own report on expenditures later confirmed this charge.

The Republicans were not harmed by this political raid on Arizona. I know I received many votes from Democrat union members angered at the nullification of their franchise by their union officials.

Republicans were not damaged, but the basic political rights of Arizona union members were violated. Again many of the union members found their own money was being used to nullify their votes, this time inside the Democrat Party.

I have heard union politicians try to defend their actions in such instances by describing their own superior knowledge of political candidates. They say the union members are too uninformed, too ignorant, to know which candidate inside the Democrat Party is a real, honest-to-God, 24-carat advocate of the union member.

They, themselves, the union political leaders are devoted to principle, we are told. They just want to know whether a candidate stands for these principles. And they, the union leaders, have special knowledge about political candidates. They feel they are in a better position than their more ignorant members to make judgment on the principles of political candidates.

Well, we could cite some dozens of cases that might illuminate this devotion to principle on the part of the union politicians. We'll take one example—from Detroit, since that is the hometown and citadel of that most rarefied union Galahad of them all, Walter Reuther.

It is the case of Congressman LESINSKI of the 16th Michigan Congressional District. I have taken a special interest in Michigan, since the State has become a sort of national testing ground for union political action.

The Lesinskis are a longtime Democratic political family from an industrialized suburb of Detroit which includes Dearborn and the Ford Motor Co. factories.

The father of the present Congressman was elected first in 1933 as a very prounion Democrat. During the period when Congress was legislating a whole system of special privileges for the union leaders, during the thirties, Lesinski remained one of the most loyal and vocal supporters of the policies of the union leaders in Congress. He remained so as a member of the House Labor Committee, finally becoming ranking Democrat and chairman of the committee in 1949 and 1950.

There was probably no man in the House of Representatives to whom the union leaders owed so much as to Congressman Lesinski. When he died—I believe it was in 1950—his son, the present Congressman LESINSKI, was elected Democrat Representative from the same district.

The younger LESINSKI has followed in his father's tradition. He, too, voted for policies which the union leaders desired. He, too, as had his father before him, stood 100 percent for policies supported by the union politicians.

You are familiar with the voting records put out by the union leaders. We are told that these voting records are the basis on which the union supports a candidate. These embody the principles, the policies, for which the union leaders stand.

A man who stands high on this list has, on principle, the right to expect the political help of the union leaders.

Well, gentlemen, what of the present Congressman LESINSKI? His voting record from 1950 to 1956 was 100 percent in accord with the legislative program of the union officials. Not once in that time did he deviate.

What happened to him? Well, it is an interesting story, and it has something to do with the question of principle.

If there is anywhere in this country a family, father and son, who deserved, on principle, the support of the union leaders, it was the Lesinskis.

What happened was this: Stellato, president of the largest union local in Walter Reuther's organization, was chosen to go into the Democrat primary to destroy LESINSKI and replace him as Congressman. A vicious, very high-cost campaign was waged to replace LESINSKI with this high official in Walter Reuther's organization.

And what happened?

In a district where a very high proportion of the voters are members of the United Automobile Workers, LESINSKI won an overwhelming victory over the president of the UAW local. The union members voted for the man who had a claim on them, in principle. They voted against their own union president who, by his attempt to destroy LESINSKI, was denying the importance of principle.

Walter Reuther's union politicians of the United Auto Workers took off the mask in this Democrat primary. LESINSKI, and his father before him, had every possible claim on the support of the Reuther organization, if principle were the basis of such support, to say nothing of common decency. It was not enough that they have a Representative who voted in almost every respect as they wished; the union leaders of the auto workers had to have their own hireling.

It was not a matter of principle; it was a reach for raw power, unprincipled, disloyal, indecent.

Nor is this a partisan matter. The whole ugly business I have just described took place inside the Democrat Party. This ugly thing is just as much the problem of Democrats as it is Republicans.

It is the problem of every citizen. For the rights of every citizen are being commensurately diminished as the evil, irresponsible, political power grows in the country.

Some suggest that such a power can be curbed only by creating a similar power to oppose it. Some say business should create this power. I have not yet heard any account of how this can be done which seems to me to do other than simply compound the civic evil of union politics, on a national scale.

Fifty years ago there were a few irresponsible businessmen in this country who used the assets of corporations and insurance companies in an effort to buy political candidates and parties. In 1907 a Federal law prohibited such activities.

Now we see irresponsible union officials using members' dues money to buy political candidates and a party.

Do we correct the irresponsible union leader by opposing to him an irresponsible business leader?

This is a serious question. Does such a solution really fit our American concept of the free citizen whose ballot remains significant and truly powerful because it is not overshadowed by any private or public power? Can we properly envisage a situation where great political giants fight out their private-interest battles inside our election system, so diminishing the power of an individual voter that he becomes politically significant only as the servile adjunct of one of the competing giants?

We talk now of voter apathy. What of the apathy which will come as the voter increasingly senses his political futility in competition with such irresponsible political giants?

What will be the quality of citizenship, what will be the quality of voting as more and more the voting situation becomes one where giant competing private interests drive their own hordes of voters to the polls, voters becoming more and more apathetic and cynical as they realize the increasing futility and meaninglessness of their role?

No. As I speak to you today I am not convinced that the answer to union political irresponsibility lies in a similar irresponsibility on the part of business leaders.

What then can be done?

What power is left which has both the strength and the will to cut down the irresponsible political power of the union politicians?

I believe one promising direction is through the energetic application of existing law, and appeal to the principles of the Constitution of the United States. There are developments in this direction, at the present time, which seem to me of the greatest significance. In spite of the judicial erosion of the Constitution, which has taken place I continue to place great confidence in the Constitution as a resource.

You men of the railroad industry, in particular, are familiar with the legal and constitutional questions which have been raised, since the railroads are parties to several recent cases, some still in litigation.

I refer especially to the so-called Hanson case which originated several years ago, in Nebraska, and the current Looper case, which originated in Georgia. I understand there are several other comparable cases in litigation, one in North Carolina and another in Kentucky.

Let me say at the outset that I am not a lawyer by profession. I am not even a curbstone lawyer.

These cases interest me because they go to the real point at issue. The line of reasoning as I see it developing in these cases brings into sharp focus the basic violation of civil rights which takes place when compulsory unionism is transformed into compulsory political activity.

Some have said that the Looper case is the most important labor case in the country, probably of the decade.

I believe this may be true.

Now I should like your permission to review very briefly the central meaning of the Hanson and Looper cases, and a little of their background. As railroad men and parties to these suits you have a special interest; no less as citizens you will have an interest, since every American citizen has a stake, I am convinced, in the outcome especially of the Looper case.

We know the background of the specially privileged position which Congress has given the labor unions. We know how they were given a special exemption from investigation and control as monopolies.

At the time such special privileges were granted by Congress, labor unions were comparatively weak. Some Members of Congress felt that the unions were not strong enough to bargain collectively on a relatively equal footing unless they were given special legal privileges and immunities.

Since that time unions have grown until they stand now across this Nation like a colossus, and no power outside of government can compare with them in magnitude. Even in government their reach has gone so far that there is some question whether they may not already have successfully neutralized or even conquered important sectors of our public life.

We have reached the point where we see the special privileges granted to formerly weak unions used now by the giant unions who no longer need them; used now, not to equalize collective bargaining because that is long past, but now, I say, used to achieve the actual economic conquest of the Nation—and more important, still, the political conquest of the Nation.

It is very important to keep in mind, I believe, that this great power is based on special privileges granted by the Congress under entirely different circumstances from those which prevail at present. The union politicians are taking this position of economic privilege and are attempting to transform their economic privileges into political power.

In so doing—by bringing compulsion into the field of politics—union politicians are striking directly at the constitutional rights of their own members. This is the meaning to me of the Looper case; it tests the right of union members to have a wholly autonomous political existence, apart from their unions.

In your industry union members are by compulsion members of the railway brotherhood under a union shop contract, and in the Looper case, they are suing to recover dues, fees, and assessments which they have been compelled to pay to the union and which union officials have then used for political purposes.

Just several months ago a Georgia court found for the plaintiffs, the union members. The Georgia court declared compulsory union membership to be unconstitutional when it includes the use of dues money for political purposes.

This case will move now to the Supreme Court of the United States. Not only union members, but every citizen of the United States will have a stake in the outcome.

I should not care to predict what the Supreme Court will do with this case. In the Hanson case, in 1956, which was a key test of the constitutionality of the union-shop provision of the Railway Labor Act, the Court, in upholding the provision, hinted that the decision might have been different had evidence been available regarding, and I quote, "the exaction of dues, initiation fees or assessments * * * as a cover for forcing ideological conformity or other action in contravention of the first amendment * * *"

This hint from the Court, in the Hanson decision, gives us some basis for hope that the Looper case, pointed directly at this problem, may be decided in favor of the union members.

The decision of the Supreme Court will be historic. I will venture this prediction: The Looper decision will be cited in the future as one of the historic decisions in the history of American political freedom.

Not only you railroad men and your employees but every citizen in the United States, I repeat, has a great stake in the outcome.

The dignity and the independence of the franchise of every American citizen is at stake in this decision.

Let us hope, let us pray, that the decision in these railroad labor cases will let new light and new fresh air into the increasingly murky political scene of our country.

There is no place in America for second-class citizens.

No man in America should be asked to surrender inalienable political rights as the price of earning a living. This, gentlemen, is the civil rights problem of the North.

ANNIVERSARY OF POLISH INSURRECTION OF 1863

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, yesterday marked the anniversary of a very important day in the history of the Polish nation. It is an anniversary which holds a tremendous significance for the entire world.

January 22, 1863, was the day that Polish patriots led an insurrection against Russian control. This insurrection was suppressed, resulting in the absorption of Poland into the Russian empire, and in barbarous punishment of thousands of Polish patriots. Whole Polish villages were exiled, with Russians brought in to take their places.

The significance of this anniversary to the Polish people today is inescapable. Poland lives today under another kind of equally tyrannous domination—that of Soviet communism, imposed and maintained over the Polish people by the force of Red arms.

It is a well-known fact that, although the Polish Government today is Communist, the Polish population is not. I saw much evidence of this at first hand during a visit to Poland a little more than a year ago.

The past few months have seen many far-reaching developments in the strategic position of Poland. The Polish Government has been able to win significant concessions from its Soviet masters—by exerting the brave and steadfast dedication to liberty that the Polish people have so long held in their hearts. This situation makes Poland one of the key areas of the world—and an area where a bold, forward-looking U.S. foreign policy is a vital necessity.

My own observation of the people of Poland, and my warm friendship with so many great Americans of Polish descent in my own State, convince me that this valiant people will never freely submit to Soviet rule nor willfully labor for the cause of international communism.

Because of this, America and the free world know they have a strong and valiant ally in the Polish people, once the realities of world affairs make it possible for them to express their free will and to act upon it.

Today I want to join my colleagues in assuring liberty-loving Polish people everywhere that this country will remain ever mindful of their right to national self-expression, and that we will seek to utilize every opportunity to give moral and psychological encouragement and support to their just and urgent cause.

NEEDED: EARLY ACTION ON COUNTRY LIFE COMMISSION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently I introduced a bill for the establishment of a Country Life Commission. The revolutionary changes in agriculture in recent years, I believe, require an objective, long-range review of problems and challenges, including:

First. Economic and social effects on farm life;

Second. Need for better long-range planning to meet the problems of the future; and Third. Promoting closer cooperation between farm and city interests; and other constructive recommendations for improving the outlook in agriculture.

I respectfully urge our colleagues on the Agriculture and Forestry Committee to set up hearings as soon as possible so that the Senate will have an opportunity to take early and, I hope, favorable action on this legislation.

I would like to point out that the proposed Country Life Commission had an important forerunner in our history.

In 1908, President Teddy Roosevelt established such a commission. In 1909 the Commission made its report to the President on such problems as preserving soil, water, and forest resources; protecting the rights of farmers; and generally, attempting to cope with the changes in agriculture occurring in that day and age.

Over the years, this has proved to be an extremely valuable study.

Now, 50 years later, following far-reaching changes in agriculture—particularly due to technological developments—I believe we need to take another long-range look at the farm situation.

Following the introduction of my bill, I was pleased to note in the Milwaukee Journal—an outstanding newspaper, not only in Wisconsin, but the Nation—an editorial expressing approval of establishing such a commission to take a new look at the long-range problems in agriculture.

I request unanimous consent to have the editorial printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COUNTRY LIFE

The financial aspects of the American farm situation get much attention from many different agencies, official and unofficial, and from the public. The human aspects of the farm situation get very little.

The two are closely interrelated. But the problems of satisfactory human readjustment to changing social and economic forces are not to be solved with price supports, Soil Bank payments or other financial aids.

The character, interests, alinements and ties of the farm population are going through almost revolutionary changes. Changes in education, amusements, transportation, and communication are remaking rural life.

Men with city jobs are finding advantage in living on a farm and farm families find advantages or attractions in part-time or full-time jobs in town. Lines between town dweller and farm dweller are being erased.

Senator WILEY will shortly introduce legislation to establish a Country Life Commission to study these trends. It would make a report and recommendations to Congress 2 years later.

President Theodore Roosevelt appointed such a commission. He wrote later that it was "opposed with venomous hostility by the foolish reactionaries in Congress and abandoned by my successor." But it did produce an impact long felt. It focused attention on some of the values in rural life and ways to help preserve them.

So why not another American Country Life Commission, composed of outstanding persons dedicated to rural welfare in the broad sense? It could surely make worthwhile contributions to congressional and public thinking in this period of rapid rural change.

CHINA'S COMMUNES

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, Red China claims that an additional 80 million acres of land were brought under irrigation last year. It is claimed that in 1 year the ratio of irrigated land to available acreage has been doubled—from 30 to 61 percent. Under our own Reclamation Act of 1902, the U.S. Government has brought fewer than 8 million acres under irrigation, in almost 60 years, in the 17 Western States.

In one province of Red China, Honan, it is claimed that 98 percent of the peasants eat in over 300,000 common messhalls. In nine Provinces, 80 percent of farm families eat in more than a million public dining halls, according to Radio Peiping.

Mr. President, these statistics are staggering—unbelievable. Yet the statements are made by responsible journalists.

To ascertain the facts, I believe that it is time all of us paid more careful attention to the monstrous social revolution in China. Therefore I call the attention of the Senate to an article in the Wall Street Journal of January 5, wherein a staff reporter gives account of China's communes, and ask that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 5, 1959]

CHINA'S COMMUNES—WITH MOST OF PEASANTRY IN BRIGADES, REDS SLOW DRIVE, EASE RULES A BIT—MRS. FANG "JOYFULLY" GIVES UP FAMILY FOR FACTORY WORK BUT MR. SHANG IS PAINED—THREAT TO FREE WORLD GROWS

(By Igor Oganesoff)

TOKYO.—Mrs. Fang Chin-fen used to "weep secret tears" because, with seven children and never-ending household chores, she just didn't have time to work in a factory at Chengcho in central China. Now, however, her heart is filled with "extravagant joy" because she does have time to toil in a local clothing plant.

Credit for turning Mrs. Fang's tears to joy goes to the People's Commune of Happiness which Mrs. Fang has joined "voluntarily"—or so says the government-controlled press of Red China. This commune, like similar groups throughout Red China, is a nearly self-sufficient labor unit in which men and women must all perform the work of factory hands, farmers, and militiamen. In the commune, Mrs. Fang's younger children are tended in public nurseries and the entire family eats all meals in a common mess hall, leaving her "no longer encumbered with family and housework."

Mrs. Fang and her family are caught up in a sociological and economic revolution now sweeping the world's most populous nation. To speed the economic growth of Red China—the so-called great leap forward—Communist Party boss Mao Tse-tung in recent months has forced nearly all of mainland China's 500 million peasants into some 25,000 communes. The drastic communization campaign is, among other things, exterminating nearly all private property, destroying the traditional Chinese society of tightly knit families and liberating women for work in factories and fields. Radio Peiping on New Year's Eve said 24 million children now were being cared for in public nurseries.

COMMUNES HIT OBSTACLES

Red China's pell-mell rush to create a society much more communistic than the Soviet Union is running into some obstacles. In fact, China's Communist Party has ordered a slowdown on extending communes to large cities and has relaxed some of the more drastic practices in existing peasant communes. Some students of Red China argue that Mao's relinquishment of China's top government post may indicate an internal party conflict over the speed at which communes should be pushed.

But evidence coming from behind the Bamboo Curtain suggests that Mao's commune drive is neither in any danger of stalling nor faltering in any significant way—at least so far. As boss of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao is still firmly in command of Red China. And there are no concrete signs so far that a slowdown of his whirlwind commune campaign amounts to much more than a consolidation of previous steps. Reports from visitors to Red China—along with the Communists' own claims—indicate that Mao still is moving at a frightening pace toward one of his party's avowed goals: To destroy family life built on the small circle of petty private ownership.

Red China's upheaval has wide ramifications for Americans and others outside the People's Republic of China. If Mao's great experiment works without touching off a revolt, China could emerge as an industrialized giant and a more formidable world trade competitor and military power. Fueled by a violent anti-American philosophy now being instilled in its people, a modern China bent on pure Marxism could pose a great threat to world peace. The Soviet Union, Mao's neighbor and nominal ally, itself might have good reason to fear an awakened Red China sorely in need of more productive land for its burgeoning population (estimated at 650 million now and likely to increase to 1 billion by 1980).

Even the failure of Red China's commune experiment could be dangerous for the free world. Any mounting discontent among China's regimented masses could prompt the Communist leaders to take the people's minds off domestic woes by launching a foreign adventure in the Korean war pattern.

COOPERATIVES TO COMMUNES

China's communes got started quietly less than a year ago and have popped up on a large scale in rural areas only in the past 6 months. But in that short time, 99 percent of China's peasant households have been herded into the labor units. The communes, in part, replace cooperative farms which had been set up in the Soviet pattern after the Communists gained full control of mainland China in 1949.

The Shangyu Peoples Commune in Kiangsi Province, for example, amalgamated 17 farm cooperatives with a population of 74,000 and now includes iron and steel works, fertilizer plans, machine-building factories, repair shops, 48 retail centers, and 6 comprehensive stores, according to the Reds.

"Communes are the basic economic unit now, and also the basic units of state power," claims a recent Peiping newspaper editorial. The communes, explains another Red editorial, "marshal all resources to cope with problems of production which the co-ops are unable to solve."

Basically, communes are organized along military lines in self-contained groups of about 4,800 households each. In these units, peasants in one area are pressed into farm work or factory work, according to what needs to be done at the time. In between, they are drilled as militia.

"The advantages" of these labor brigades, according to one writer in the Red China press, "are more labor power for big power projects, like dams and roads, more funds and unified natural resources." These labor brigades are highly mobile and adaptable to handle various jobs. For example, 20,000 workers were mustered in neighboring areas just to plow a commune in Honan Province. And, in Shansi Province, 1,200 members of a commune's "iron and steel shock brigade" spent several days just weeding sweetpotato fields.

The communes are Mao's chief tool in Red China's gigantic effort to become a modern industrial state. The country has come a long way in industrialization since the Reds took charge of the backward, disorganized farm economy 9 years ago. Now, under the forced-draft commune system, China's leaders are aiming at a much more spectacular speedup in economic development. Their second 5-year plan, which ends in 1962, calls for a doubling of the 1957 level of industrial production.

SPURRING STEEL OUTPUT

Peiping claims the country doubled steel production in 1958, turning out 11 million tons, and expects to increase output to 18 million tons in 1959. Helping spur production are thousands of primitive "backyard" blast furnaces that now dot China's landscape.

On the farm front, the Chinese claim that in 1958 food production was double that of a year earlier—a boost which, like many other Red economic statistics, Westerners find hard to believe. Already China claims to have outstripped the United States in winter wheat and cotton output. In north China, the Reds boast, grain output was increased 42 percent in 1958 through irrigation, deep plowing and the use of more fertilizer. China claims that last year it brought an additional 80 million acres under irrigation, supposedly boosting the ratio of irrigated land to about 60 percent from 31 percent of available acreage and giving China one-third of the world's irrigated land.

Though these Communist claims may be exaggerated, Western diplomats generally have no doubt the nation is going through a period of phenomenal growth.

Once a commune starts operating, reports like this begin popping up in Radio Peiping broadcasts and in the local press: "The July 1 commune plowed 600 acres of land in 6 days * * *and one of the production brigades refused to stop work and leave though it was 3 or 4 in the morning." Or, workers in the supply and marketing section of No. 17 State Cotton Mill "voluntarily asked for abolition of their quarterly bonus."

Such stories are probably partly true—if one overlooks the word "voluntary." No Stalin-type "liquidation" of recalcitrant peasants is involved; nor does communization even come in the form of flat party directives. The Red bosses, aware that their commune campaign, if mismanaged, could erupt in revolt, seek cooperation by "persuasion"—but in a manner that makes "no" nearly an impossible answer.

PERSUADING "VOLUNTEERS"

An integral part of this uniquely Chinese approach is the public "debate." Communist cadres discuss all issues with local peasants, encouraging them to voice their complaints, but then "guiding" them to the "right track." The Chinese farmer usually doesn't want to be branded "backward" or "reactionary" so he goes along with the argument, realizing the hopelessness of resisting. Thus, he ends up "volunteering" as requested—for joining communes, for pay cuts, for anything the Communists want.

In one area, some 70,000 propagandists were used, Peiping newspapers claim, to prepare the populace for communes. "After 2 nights of debating," reports one daily, "the absolute majority of co-op members in Kweichow Province came to understand the advantages of the commune and demanded that it be speedly established."

In other areas, it's reported that communes were set up "at the urgent request of the peasants." Reports a provincial newspaper: "Applications to join the commune in Wenchiang town keep Party Secretary Yin Chien-te from his night's sleep completely. As soon as he lies down he is awakened by peasants."

In most cases, peasants get no compensation for giving up their property. But a few communes, reports a Red-controlled publication, have paid for pooled property "since even the upper-middle peasants sweated for their money and it might affect the enthusiasm of those not yet communized." When some peasants complain about giving all to communes others apparently "persuade" them that it is all for the best.

For example, the Peiping Daily reports that old Peasant Shang Chih-ching complained at a commune gathering: "I have worked hard and industriously for 2 or 3 years and with great difficulty I have accumulated a little money. Now I see it going into the commune. I really feel pained." But then, continues the newspaper report, poor Peasant Pang Chin-hua "rose and said, 'How did we become rich from being poor? Was it not through cooperatives with more people and greater strength?' These words brought everybody to his senses."

CONFISCATING AND BACKTRACKING

Communes at first did away with nearly all private property. Peasants were compelled to surrender small garden plots, fruit trees, wagons, tools, fishing nets, most farm animals and even their houses, if asked. Complained Ma Pao-shan, director of the Hanchiahua Commune in Honan Province: "Before the communes were set up, some co-op members paid attention only to the berries raised in their self-retained plots and would go off at wheat harvest time to sell them. Or others raising pigs would pay no attention to the weeds that grew tall in sweetpotato fields."

But in mid-December the Communist regime—indirectly conceding that some commune leaders had carried things too far—ordered that some concessions be made to the hard-pressed peasants. The Communist Party directed that commune members could, after all, retain such things as trees around their homes, a few small domestic animals and some simple farm tools—provided such ownership doesn't interfere with commune production.

At the same time, the Red leaders did some more backtracking in their commune drive. They indefinitely postponed extending communes to larger cities, citing "complex conditions" and a more "bourgeois ideology" there. They called for improving communal nurseries and paying more attention to "wholesome tasty food" in public messhalls. They set an 8-hour workday as "normal" and even said that parents didn't have to leave their children in communal nurseries any more. The latter is rather an empty concession since most mothers are in the fields or factories all day.

It's likely that some peasant discontent is behind this relaxation of the rigid commune pattern. But there also undoubtedly is much truth in the Communists' explanation that communes still are in an experimental stage and that a period of "consolidation" is needed before the government can settle on the most workable formula for running communes.

"The peoples commune is entirely a new thing to us; it is a subject for which no ready answer could be found in books," writes the Peiping People's Daily.

Experimentation and a lack of uniformity characterize the present commune system. For example, some messhalls serve all meals to the commune members, while others furnish only soup, with rice to be cooked at home. In some communes, grain ration tickets are issued; in others there is no fixed limit to consumption, but the amount eaten by each household is announced from time to time "for purposes of comparison."

EATING AND COMMUNISM

"To solve the problem of eating is a big step toward communism," declares a Peiping newspaper. To illustrate how the life of genuine abundance has been guaranteed, the paper tells about Lu Chao-fa, an old man who often went without dinner because it was his fate to have two quarrelsome daughters. Now, however, he has no more food worries since the advent of communal dining rooms. And when Lu Chao-fa is too old to do any manual labor, he can enter a happy home—sort of a communal old folks' barracks.

Although commune menus are meager by Western standards, fare at the public messhalls undoubtedly seems generous to most of China's millions, who long have lived on near-starvation diets. Commune members in Anwhei Province reportedly get a pound a day of vegetables and 1 or 2 pounds of pork monthly. And the Reds talk proudly of the Liutsichieh messhall where in a single month the masses have been served roast fish once and steamed meat once.

But Red writers can be critical, too. Peiping newspapers complain that some messhalls serve only rice and no vegetables, while others serve vegetables in meager quantities and also poor in quality. Some public eating halls have not the simplest device to keep rice and vegetables warm and quite a number serve nothing but sweetpotatoes meal after meal.

Unfortunately, report party functionaries, there has been some tendency among commune members to regard kitchen duty as toilsome and dirty work which should be given to landlords, counterrevolutionaries, and rich peasants—the villians of the Chinese Communist state. But this is all wrong, say the party officials. In fact, it's downright dangerous since some cases of dropping poison into the food occurred one after another when such reactionaries were given kitchen jobs.

SPUTNIK AND NURSERIES

In Honan Province in central China where the commune system got its start (Sputnik Commune was the first), 98 percent of the peasants eat in over 300,000 common messhalls. In 9 north and northeast provinces, 80 percent of farm families now eat in some 1,074,000 public dining halls, claims Peiping Radio. Here, too, are 341,000 nurseries and kindergartens which have freed 7 million women from household tasks.

The Hsiehfang Commune in Honan cares for 173 children, 3 to 7 years old, most of whom live all week in the nursery. They wear white blouses with blue shorts or skirts and each has a washbasin with a numbered towel and gets four meals every day, reports a Communist author. The commune pays all costs.

Besides freeing millions of women for labor brigades, the communal nurseries serve an important ideological function. The children, claims a Red writer, do not think about their own homes, they treat the nursery as their home. To be sure, they romp and play in children's games but then the teachers lead them to pull weeds and they begin to study socialist labor in this way. Some recent visitors to Red China have returned with films of Chinese children singing Formosa is ours and socialism is best while playing with toy guns passed out by the commune.

Guns and military training are an integral part of communal life. (One commune's slogan: "One hand on the hoe, one on the rifle.") But canny Communist leaders make sure that arms are not left in the possession of peasants who haven't proved their reliability. According to one Red press account, only young political activists get rifles, and then only after rigid tests for political reliability.

HOW MUCH DISCONTENT?

It is extremely difficult for outsiders to ascertain how much discontent is being generated among Chinese peasants by the rigid regimentation and family-destroying features of commune life. The Chinese Nationalists on Formosa insist discontent is high and, as partial proof, cite such evidence as the recent uprising on Lappa Island, a revolt (which was crushed) that could be viewed by observers on nearby Portuguese Macao. Other reports claim some 300,000 people in Tibet have been in revolt.

Most observers, however, insist that so far there is no reason to believe that Mao is in any danger of a full-scale revolt. Some authorities argue that the commune system, despite its totalitarian features, may at first have a strong appeal by offering the poorest Chinese a slightly higher standard of living. Communist spokesmen, of course, claim communes already have improved incomes, as well as speeding the day when China will be a modern industrial state.

The pioneer Sputnik Commune, which consists of 9,300 households and 43,000 people, has figured out that its normal yearly income should be 14 million yuan (about $5.6 million), of which 2.6 million yuan will go for taxes and expenses and 8 million yuan for savings, leaving 3.4 million yuan for distribution to members. This, claim commune officials, will mean an average annual income of about 80 yuan ($32) per person. They estimate that their members in pre-sputnik 1957 made less than $10 each. Commune officials measure members' incomes in terms of both cash and the value of commodities and services they receive from the commune.

Communes have abandoned a daily point system for calculating wages and now favor straight salaries, which vary considerably from commune to commune, depending on how much the commune furnishes members. In the Shanchum Commune, food, clothing, shoes, and other necessities are supplied free, so wages are kept low. As a rule, if a commune supplies only grain, wages make up half the total income. If all food is supplied, wages drop to 40 percent of the total; and if all necessities (including clothing, medicine, maternity care, and funeral expenses) are given, the peasant draws only 20 percent of his income in cash.

The income of each worker is determined by his skill and experience, as well as by such factors as attitude. In one commune, cash wages vary from the equivalent of 80 cents a month for laborers to $5.60 monthly for highly skilled workers. Other communes give more uniform wages, with bonuses for good workers. Wages are supposed to be raised yearly as productivity increases. But, say some commune regulations, the wage increase should be less than the production rise, allowing more to be invested in such things as mechanization.

AIR POLLUTION

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, all persons who live in industrial areas in this country owe thanks to the senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] for his authorship of the Air Pollution and Technical Assistance Act of 1955.

It has been more than 10 years since smog took a dreadful toll of 20 dead and hundreds injured on October 30 and 31, 1948, in Donora, Pa., but the seriousness and scope of the air pollution problem is just becoming known. It is generally recognized now that air pollution causes or aggravates dangerous chronic ailments as well as an estimated $4 billion worth of property damage per year.

The 1955 act permitted the Federal Government to make a belated start in the fight against air pollution. Under its terms the Government, acting through the Public Health Service, was authorized to carry out a 5-year program of investigation, research and training to assist State and local governments to check, reduce and control atmospheric impurities. A total expenditure of $25 million was authorized, although only $12 million has actually been appropriated for the purposes of the act to date. The budget estimate for 1960 includes $4,212,200 for air pollution purposes—an alltime high—but a lamentably low figure in view of the problem.

In Pennsylvania, progress has been made under the act. Eighteen sampling stations have been set up in the Commonwealth for testing purposes, and their findings have made a significant contribution to cancer research. Technical studies have been completed by the Franklin Institute in Philadelphia, the University of Pittsburgh, and the Pittsburgh Coke Co., and research grants have also been made for studies currently under way at the Jefferson Hospital in Philadelphia, Penn State University, the University of Pittsburgh, and the Pennsylvania State Department of Health. A large grant and contract are presently being negotiated for research in Pennsylvania on the problem of diesel exhaust. A statewide survey to collect data from all major towns and to assess the major sources of pollution is scheduled to get under way next month at the request of the State authorities. Similar surveys have been conducted in several other States and are planned elsewhere.

It would be unthinkable to let this Federal air pollution program lapse when the act expires by its own terms on June 30, 1959.

Control of air pollution will not be achieved unless the Federal Government continues and increases its efforts. Only 12 States have comprehensive antipollution legislation at present. Assistant Surgeon General Hollis has asserted that "10,000 communities in the United States have an air pollution problem of some kind, but only 250 have active, operating programs." Private industry is spending large sums to combat pollutants, but business efforts to this end vary enormously. Air pollution is a problem which totally defies company, community, county, and State boundaries.

I urge support for the bill (S. 441) introduced by Senator KUCHEL on behalf of himself and Senator ENGLE, to extend the life of the Air Pollution Act, and I urge early favorable action upon it by the Committee on Public Works.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on the next printing of the bill my name be added as a cosponsor. I will say to the distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], who is one of the cosponsors of the bill, that I discussed the matter with his senior colleague and that he said it would be agreeable to him to have my name added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ENGLE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

FLOODS IN PENNSYLVANIA AND OHIO

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the morning newspapers carry accounts of the widespread toll of death and havoc left by the severe storm and floods in Pennsylvania and Ohio. The Pennsylvania cities of Sharon, New Castle, Union City, Meadville, and Verona have been cut off from the outside world by floodwaters. New floodwaters are rising at Pittsburgh, where the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers join to form the Ohio River. The level of the water is 4 feet over the flood stage, and water is already flowing over some of the low-lying streets in the north side of that city.

Our Pennsylvania congressional delegation has been prompt in calling upon the President to declare this area of Pennsylvania a distress area in order that the Corps of Army Engineers may go to work immediately to help take care of the damage, and that the American Red Cross may go to work to feed the families who are being distressed by the flood.

The counties affected are Mercer, Lawrence, Allegheny, Crawford, Warren,

Franklin, Venango, and Armstrong, and 2,275 families are affected in the area. Six shelters have been opened, and they now shelter 220 people, or more.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a telegram received by me from the Honorable David L. Lawrence, Governor of Pennsylvania, calling attention to the fact that these floods might not have had their devastating effect if the Kinzua Dam, which those of us in Pennsylvania have so long advocated, had been built.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARRISBURG, PA., January 22, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH S. CLARK, Jr.,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

The flooding which has occurred in the Allegheny watershed emphasizes once again the urgency to begin construction on the Kinzua Dam. I am informed that had this installation been made, much of the damage to the communities in the area would not have occurred. Although I realize that current litigation has stalled any expenditure of the limited funds available for this project, I am hopeful that the matter can be decided in favor of the Government promptly. It is imperative that sufficient funds be provided to be ready to work full speed ahead as soon as the legal determination has been made. I earnestly hope that you will give your vigorous support to this project which is vital to the safety and development of such a large section of Pennsylvania.

DAVID L. LAWRENCE,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks a telegram which I received from the Honorable George X. Simonetta, mayor of Meadville, Pa., asking for assistance in obtaining the President's consent to declare this area a distress area.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator JOSEPH CLARK,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

I have this day forwarded the following telegram to President Eisenhower:

"The city of Meadville is being inundated by the rising waters of French Creek, which have already surpassed the highest flood of record. City council has declared a state of emergency. The flood is endangering lives, causing severe and extensive property damage; is disrupting all forms of transportation and industry and commerce; constitutes a serious health menace. It is respectfully requested that you declare Meadville to be a major disaster area pursuant to Public Law 875, 81st Congress."

Your immediate support to this request will be greatly appreciated.

GEORGE X. SIMONETTA,
Mayor, City of Meadville, Pa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks copies of telegrams sent to the President at the White House and to Leo A. Hoegh, Administrator of the Federal Civil Defense Administration, requesting help in the present tragic situation.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 23, 1959.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.:

We urge that you declare flooded areas in Pennsylvania to be major disaster areas to permit immediate Federal assistance as requested by Gov. David L. Lawrence.

JOSEPH S. CLARK,
U.S. Senator From Pennsylvania.
FRANK M. CLARK,
Member of Congress, 25th District, Pennsylvania.
DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Member of Congress, 11th District, Pennsylvania.

JANUARY 23, 1959.

LEO A. HOEGH,
Administrator, Federal Civil Defense Administration, Washington, D.C.:

We urge speed in survey of flood in Pennsylvania and recommendation to President that affected areas be declared major disaster areas at earliest possible time in compliance with request for Federal assistance by Gov. David L. Lawrence of Pennsylvania.

JOSEPH S. CLARK,
U.S. Senator From Pennsylvania.
FRANK M. CLARK,
Member of Congress, 25th District, Pennsylvania.
DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Member of Congress, 11th District, Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I know that if the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] were here today he would join in this bipartisan effort to bring Federal aid to these seriously distressed areas. I am sure he would want me to say on his behalf that he is just as keenly interested as the rest of us in this situation. Representative FRANK M. CLARK, who comes from the Meadville area, has already gone to the western part of the State to see what he can do to cooperate with the Corps of Army Engineers and the Red Cross. The Honorable CARROLL D. KEARNS, of the 24th District, which embraces Crawford and Mercer Counties, is also showing a very keen interest in the situation. I am confident that the four Representatives from Allegheny County are also alert to the situation.

Mr. President, this flood disaster emphasizes the fact that water control problems are not confined to the West, and that we have such problems in the East, too. I hope that as flood control measures come before the Senate, we will realize the drastic need for additional Federal aid to save lives and prevent property damage.

THE EXCHANGE-OF-PERSONS PROGRAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as Senators are aware, critics of the foreign policies of the United States are becoming increasingly numerous. On one phase of our foreign policy, however, there is almost unanimous agreement. Few can be found throughout the United States and the world who are critical of the exchange-of-persons program of this country.

These programs have almost universal support and, for that reason, it has always been incomprehensible to me that the Bureau of the Budget of the executive branch and the appropriations committees of the Congress have been so niggardly in providing adequate funds to strengthen and expand these activities.

Only recently it came to my attention that the Bureau of the Budget disapproved a proposal by the State Department to allocate $2.35 million in Japanese yen for the purpose of continuing the educational exchange program with Japan. The funds proposed to be used by the State Department were proceeds of recent Public Law 480 sales to Japan. The Bureau of the Budget's objection to this proposal is even more difficult to understand in view of the action of the Congress in amending Public Law 480 to provide that educational exchanges be given priority in allocation of local currency proceeds of Public Law 480 sales, particularly in countries where sufficient foreign currencies are unavailable for this program from other sources.

The amendment to Public Law 480, to which I referred, and the legislative history developed when the amendment was under consideration in the Congress, clearly established this priority for use of these funds for educational exchanges.

The only conclusion I am able to draw is that the Bureau of the Budget has decided to ignore this directive of the Congress.

I have written the Director of the Bureau of the Budget expressing my concern over the disapproval of the Department of State's proposal, and I have requested the Director's views regarding this action. I sincerely hope the proposal will be reconsidered.

Because I originally sponsored in the Congress Public Law 584, providing that proceeds from the sales of surplus property be utilized for educational exchange grants, I have always followed the progress of the program with keen interest. Each year I receive hundreds of letters from educational exchange participants commenting upon the value of the programs to the United States. Because I should like to share some of these letters with my colleagues in the Congress, and because I should like those who read the RECORD to have the benefit of the comments of participants of the educational exchange programs, I ask unanimous consent that a number of letters and related materials be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I hope this year the Congress will be more generous in appropriating funds for the exchange programs.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF NOTRE DAME,
ENGLISH DEPARTMENT,
Notre Dame, Ind., December 6, 1958.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Fayetteville, Ark.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: Having returned last August from a year as a Fulbright lecturer in American literature at the University of Aarhus in Denmark, I want to express my thanks to you as the initiator of the program which made my year abroad possible. But my gratitude does not end there. My own experience the past year, though of great importance to me, is not a matter of consuming public interest. However, when I think of the hundreds, perhaps by now the thousands, of American students, scholars, and teachers who, under the Fulbright Act, have been given the same chance as I have had to experience a foreign culture at firsthand I realize the debt which all Americans, not only the recipients, owe to the program. For what these many people bring from America to the outside world and what they bring back from the outside world to our schools, colleges, and universities is of incalculable value to all of us, especially in view of our present situation in world affairs.

To the countries they visit the various Fulbright grantees make different contributions of an intellectual and cultural order which can be clearly defined. But what they all contribute is a less easily specified yet necessary understanding of America. In one sense, America is too well known abroad. Everywhere America is news—a fact which convinces most foreigners that they know more about America than they do. Actually, their knowledge consists largely of a vast abstraction created by newspaper headlines, an image of a huge economic and military power. The Fulbright grantee by his very presence, by his living, breathing, concrete hereness does much to humanize the image. He is not just passing through on a pleasure trip like the tourist, he does not wear the symbol of military strength as do the servicemen, and he is not suspected of ulterior professionally nationalistic motives as are the diplomatic corps. His willingness to live and learn for a year or more among the people of his host country out of a purely personal interest must in itself create a favorable impression. Beyond that, the good impression will be heightened in proportion to the talents, intelligence, tact, and pleasing qualities which he can display.

What the Fulbright grantees bring back home is not only an experiential knowledge of their host countries but an increased awareness of their own identity as Americans. Against the contrastive, challenging foreign background they are forced to feel and to think about their national character as never before. Also they are likely to be struck with the powerful position which their country occupies in the world. Of course, they have been told of this, but the fact is more vividly realized in a foreign perspective. With this realization comes a sharpened sense of the complicated responsibilities and dangers involved in our situation.

But I should save my lectures for the classroom. All I wanted to do was to say thank you for the program which bears your name, not only for what it has meant to me the past year but for what it means to all of us as citizens of the United States and as citizens of the world.

Sincerely yours,

ERNEST SANDEEN,
Associate Professor.

ROLLA, January 11, 1959.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I hope that my letter will not be the first one in order to thank you very much for your idea to establish a scholarship commission which bears your name now. I am German by birth and came over to the United States due to one of your scholarships, September last year, accompanied by my wife.

The experiences we have got already during our stay in your home country mostly were good and also sometimes bad. But whatever it was, we enjoyed it very much to have this fine possibility to see the States and their people, how they really are and not in the version of colored films or papers. After all I hope that we both, my wife and me, shall be able to understand the doings of your fellow countrymen and their way of living.

Therefore, that you made this possible, we thought we had to thank you.

With best wishes and kindest regards to you.

Yours truly,

HEINZ WESEMANN.

Senator WILLIAM FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: Recently I returned to my university after enjoying a 2-year Fulbright research grant to Finland. I am happy to report that my project has been completed. My biography and critical study, entitled "Sibelius," will be published in the United States by Alfred A. Knopf and in a Finnish translation by Mr. Yrjö Kivimies by the Otava Publishing Co., Helsinki, during the fall of 1959. When the proof is ready Knopf hopes to place it with publishers in the British Commonwealth and in Sweden.

Inasmuch as official reports deal almost exclusively with the grantee, I thought that you might be interested in my wife's Finnish project. During our first year in Finland she studied the art of weaving in a private institution and during the second year she was a regular student in a Government superior school where she worked with master weavers. As a result of these 2 years of hard work she has been able to convert a hobby into an art.

Our daughter passed examinations for the sixth and seventh grades in the so-called English school in Helsinki where she received superior instruction.

We all agree that these 2 years in Finland have been the most stimulating and rewarding ones in our lives. We hope to maintain the contacts, both professional and social, with our Finnish friends throughout the remaining years.

I cannot find words to thank the USEF and the USIS in Helsinki for doing everything possible to facilitate my research. I trust also I may be permitted to thank you for having created a program which is unique in American and international education.

Respectfully yours,

HAROLD E. JOHNSON,
Associate Professor of Musicology.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,

Senator the Honorable J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Fayetteville, Ark.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: You will recall that we had a conversation at Blair House at the reception for the SEATO leader grantees, of which I had the privilege and great honor to be a member. At this reception I was also very glad to have the opportunity to talk with Senators SMITH and MUNDT, who had introduced the legislation into the Senate, to bring foreign leaders to America.

Since my return to Australia I have written to Senators SMITH and MUNDT to let them know just how much I had enjoyed my visit to their great country and to congratulate them on their foresight in arranging leader grants. I have certainly gained in education, knowledge, and experience from my visit. I am sure that such exchanges add materially in promoting good will and understanding.

I had approximately 60 days in America and I shall ever remember the great kindness and hospitality of all the people, in all the towns and all the cities I visited. Likewise, I shall remember the kindness and trouble taken by the U.S. Armed Forces during my visits to Boston, San Francisco, Norfolk, and Pearl Harbor naval commands and Norad, Cape Canaveral, Wright-Patterson, and Andrews Air Force Bases.

I thoroughly enjoyed visiting so many of the towns and cities where American history and traditions were born. I was indeed fortunate to visit Williamsburg, Jamestown, Philadelphia, Bunker Hill, Lexington, Concord, and Washington—to mention only a few.

I was most impressed with the officials at the State Department, who were responsible for arranging our visit and also with that excellent organization, the Government Affairs Institute, which planned our detailed itinerary. My every requirement, no matter how small, or large, was satisfied without fuss or bother.

The senior officials at the Pentagon, particularly Assistant Secretaries Perkins McGuire, Mansfield Sprague, George Roderick, Dudley Sharp, and Fred Bantz, could not have been more helpful. So also were the many industrial and professional men I met during my visit to the cities.

As I mentioned during our earlier conversation, Senator FULBRIGHT, your name is a very famous one in my country, because of your foresight in introducing the Fulbright scholarships, which are on an equal plane, if not higher than the Rhodes scholarships. I am sure that these scholarships are also playing a very important role in developing good will and understanding between nations.

My motive in writing is to let you know my impressions of the visit to America and of the importance of the Smith-Mundt and Fulbright Acts, in fostering international good will; as well as assisting recipients to improve their own knowledge, which can be applied for the betterment of their own countries. Future grantees can be sure that the period in America will be filled with interest, education, hospitality, and kindness—not so readily found in any other country in the world.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN P. BUCKLEY.

BRUXELLES, BELGIUM,
September 4, 1958.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I spent the academic year 1954–55 as a Fulbright grantee and another year on the staff of Minnesota University School of Business Administration as a teaching assistant. Today I am an official of Europe's Common Market in Brussels, a position that I certainly would not have obtained without my experience abroad.

Today I simply want to express my sincere gratitude for your initiative in launching the program that bears your name. May I assure you that I will never forget the warmth and hospitality I met everywhere during my stay in the United States. I cannot imagine that anybody who has been privileged to spend a period of study or research in your big country has failed to be moved by the truly wonderful way he was received by the American people.

It may interest you to know that I have tried to correct misconceptions about the United States—so often the consequence of jealousy, fear, or just plain ignorance—wherever I found them and that I will continue to do so in the future, when I will, perhaps, occupy a more influential position than today. I am contributing money to the "Thanks-America" program, but I feel sure this is not quite enough. If there is any way you can use this letter you may certainly do so.

I have returned from the States, not at all without criticism, but with a genuine, and I am certain, lasting love for America and the Americans.

Sincerely yours,

HELLMUT EGGERS,
German citizen.

The Honorable WILLIAM FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

DEAR SENATOR: At the close of a year in Germany as an exchange teacher, a year that has been a wonderful family experience as well as a valuable teaching and learning experience, I want to thank you personally for the Fulbright program.

Being a "Fulbrighter" is like wearing the old school colors for many people of a variety of ages and backgrounds who have enjoyed meeting and sharing with one another besides the rich, rewarding experience in travel and living.

I'm sure these people are as fine representatives of the United States as a large proportion of our direct foreign service representatives. Quite informally in the daily routine of living the "Fulbrighter" uses friendly persuasion to explain the United States—to hundred of residents and associates he and his family are the United States.

As the instigator and creator of this remarkably fine exchange program, you deserve a great vote of thanks. My own gratitude lies herein.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS P. COWARD.

COLON, REPUBLIC OF PANAMA,
September 18, 1958.

Senator FULBRIGHT,
The Capitol,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: If Senators in the United States are anything like the ones in Panama, you probably receive hundreds of letters daily. This may just be one of many and possibly may not even get any further than your secretary, but if you do get hundreds of thank-you letters for having initiated the Fulbright program, you deserve everyone of them.

Last year through the USIS in Panama City, I won a scholarship under Public Law 402, which enabled me to go to the United States to study for 1 year. Up to that moment, I was just barely aware of a Fulbright program. Today I am one of the many foreign students who thank you for having fought so hard to get this program under way.

When I originally left Panama to go to the United States, the one thing I had in mind was to get a master's degree. Now that I am back home with my degree, I must admit that what I got out of the scholarship was not only a degree, but a better understanding of people. This is not limited to the people of the United States, nor to Latin Americans only, but includes the people of all those nations who, under your program, were able to attend the orientation course at Duke University or to go to the University of Washington in Seattle.

Before 1957, people were only the names of countries on the map who either were friendly nations or not. My attitude was just an indifferent one. Now after having had girls from Turkey and Japan for roommates, planned parties with American and Latin girls, played volleyball with Hindi and Tai girls, learned pingpong from Indonesians, and danced with boys from Germany and Africa, I feel that the world is really one.

Therefore, Senator FULBRIGHT, I wish to thank you and at the same time say: "You have done a good job to bring the people of the world together, because foreign students in a foreign country forget about race and creed and see only a fellow student and his or her special personality."

Yours very truly,

COLOMBA LUQUE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 29, 1958.

The Honorable J. W. FULBRIGHT,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I take pleasure in sending you herewith a clipping from the Times of London which the Embassy has forwarded to us concerning the exchange program. This article was written by Sir Sydney Roberts, senior British member of the United States Educational Commission in the United Kingdom, to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the signing of the executive agreement to initiate educational exchanges between the United States and the United Kingdom under the Fulbright Act. We are informed that the article received much favorable attention.

You might be interested to know also that on the day the article appeared, the exact date of the anniversary, the British Government held a special reception at Lancaster House in honor of the occasion and of the incoming Fulbright scholars. The guests were received by the Minister of Education, Mr. Goeffrey Lloyd, M.P.

Also enclosed for your information are copies of our press releases on the signing of the extension of the agreement with the United Kingdom and the signing of the agreement to initiate the program with Spain.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD EDGAR,
Director, International Educational Exchange Service.

WELCOME INVASION OF FULBRIGHTERS

(By Sir Sydney Roberts, senior British member of the U.S. Educational Commission in the United Kingdom)

A party of some 200 Americans disembark, every September, at Southampton. Some of them are professors, some are senior research scholars; but the majority are young men and women who have recently graduated from American universities. If you went up to any member, or any group of members of the party, and asked who they were, you might well be given the laconic reply: "Fulbrighters." And, if such a reply did not fully enlighten you, you would do well to turn to one of those responsible for receiving the party and ask him for a fuller explanation. Whereupon he would no doubt remind you that, on September 22, 1948, an agreement was signed between the British Government and the Government of the United States of America for the establishment of the U.S. Educational Commission in the United Kingdom; that the Commission began its work in December of that year and that one of its main concerns was to facilitate "the attendance of citizens of the United States at institutions of higher learning located in the United Kingdom." But where, you might persist, does FULBRIGHT come in?

SURPLUS STORES

FULBRIGHT came in at the beginning, for the author of Public Law No. 584, 79th Congress, by which the Secretary of State of the United States was empowered to "enter into an agreement for certain educational activities with any foreign government for the use of currencies * * * of such foreign government as a result of surplus property disposals" was J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, Senator from the State of Arkansas and formerly Rhodes scholar of Pembroke College, Oxford. The Senator persuaded Congress to agree that the proceeds of the sale of American surplus stores in this and other countries should be used to finance an interchange of persons in the field of education. From a member of Dr. Johnson's college it was a notable gesture. But it was more than a gesture. It meant, in fact, that, annually, for a period of approximately 20 years, there would be a sum in pounds sterling equivalent to about a million dollars at the disposal of the Commission in the United Kingdom.

In accordance with the agreement, the Commission consists of 14 members—seven United States citizens appointed by the American Ambassador (who is honorary chairman of the Commission) and seven citizens of the United Kingdom appointed by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The American members are drawn partly from the staff of the Embassy and partly from American citizens resident in Great Britain. Two of the original American members were Mr. Herbert Agar and Dr. A. L. Goodhart, the latter, happily, still a participant in the work of the Commission. On the English side, the members are chosen largely from institutions of higher learning, and Sir Hector Hetherington and Dame Lillian Penson, two original members, did valuable pioneering work. The Foreign Office is normally represented by an Assistant Under Secretary of State and the Commission entrusts its day-to-day responsibilities to an executive secretary and his staff.

NOT ONE WAY

As has been hinted above, an important element in the work of the Commission is the placing of the American scholars—senior and junior—in the universities of the United Kingdom. With the selection of these scholars the Commission is not concerned. That is the responsibility of the Board of Foreign Scholarships and the State Department in Washington; the secretariat in London has the complicated and delicate task of screening and affiliating the scholars. The factor of academic quality has always been stressed in this process. The American scholars have been distributed amongst all the universities in the United Kingdom. They have been placed according to the facilities available and, through the years, they have discovered that there are other universities in this country besides Oxford, Cambridge, and London—a fact frequently overlooked by many besides visiting Americans.

But the Fulbright traffic is not wholly one way. The agreement of 1948, also authorized the use of funds for furnishing transportation for citizens of the United Kingdom who desire to attend United States schools and institutions of higher learning. This limitation to transportation is, of course, due to local currency regulations, since the Commission's funds are in sterling; but the fact that anyone who is fortunate enough to have obtained a visiting professorship, a studentship, or other award from an American university can apply for a travel grant has been of great value to British scholars; the only matter of regret is that the funds are not sufficient to aid all such academic visitors. In the past year well over 200 British scholars received round-trip travel awards to enable them to visit the United States.

THIRTY COUNTRIES

The Fulbright empire, if such a reactionary phrase may be allowed, is farther flung than Great Britain. There are United States educational commissions in 30 other countries, all working towards what Senator FULBRIGHT calls "the knowledge and understanding of one's fellow men"; and moreover, the activities of the British Commission are not confined to this island. The 1948 agreement provided for the participation of the British Colonial Dependencies in the programme, and each year the Commission approves awards to American lecturers and scholars for a year's work in Singapore, for example, or Malta, or Antigua, or Uganda. This has, indeed, been claimed as the most exciting of the Commission's activities. Certainly it has illumined the outlook of those who have taken part in it. "I wonder," wrote one who had worked in Sierra Leone, "if colonialism is not the instrument of civilization after all."

Nor is the programme limited to purely academic interchanges. One item in the Commission's budget is known as "Special Grants and Activities" and exchanges in music, drama, sculpture, and librarianship are fostered in this programme. The Commission has also sought to encourage contact between social workers on both sides of the Atlantic, and the visit in 1954 of an American social work survey team resulted in a valuable exchange of knowledge and experience. The importance of exchanges between teachers in schools is also recognized. The Commission makes a substantial contribution toward the travel of British and American teachers exchanged under the auspices of the British Interchange Committee.

Lastly, the Commission has, with the help of the Rockefeller Foundation, successfully sponsored a series of American studies conferences. The first was held at Cambridge in 1952, and the presence of such distinguished historians as H. S. Commager, Allan Nevins, and the late J. B. Brebner "induced that exciting sense of pursuing a common academic inquiry which is the peculiar reward of the true scholar."

STUDY OF UNITED STATES

Four conferences were held, two in Cambridge and two in Oxford, and out of them has sprung something permanent—namely, a British Association for American Studies, whose object is the encouragement of the study not only of the history but of the institutions, the literature, and the geography of the United States—from which it may appear that Senator FULBRIGHT planned even more wisely, and more widely, than he knew.

In the first 10 years of the program there have been over 6,600 British and American recipients of the Fulbright awards. But, without disparagement of the wider activities of the Commission, it is the 150 young graduates who have landed and will land at Southampton every September that constitute the core of the Fulbright program. It is their experience and their impressions which will form the foundation of the truer understanding which comes from close and continuous association with British universities and British people.

These impressions may not be uniformly favorable, but it is, perhaps, relevant, in conclusion, to quote the comment of one Fulbright scholar on his Cambridge experience:

"The system of supervision and the nature of college life virtually guarantee that the American student will be a participant and not an onlooker and that he will therefore contribute to student life as well as benefit from it. I know of no other educational program so inherently predestined to succeed."

In this spirit the Commission looks forward to the coming years with quiet confidence.

UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM EXTEND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE AGREEMENT

In an exchange of notes in London today the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland agreed to extend the educational exchange program carried out under the Fulbright Act for another 5-year period. The brief ceremony took place in the Foreign Office with Ambassador John Hay Whitney representing the United States and David Ormsby-Gore, British Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, representing his country. It was exactly 10 years ago today that the original agreement was concluded under which educational exchanges between the two countries were initiated.

The amendment signed today authorizes the expenditure of British currency equivalent to $5 million during the next 5 years for exchanges of persons between the United States and the United Kingdom and colonial areas for purposes of study, teaching, university lecturing, and conducting advanced research. It is estimated that this amount will provide for nearly 3,000 exchanges. Approximately 6,000 persons have been exchanged following the signing of the original agreement and several amendments to extend the program.

The Fulbright Act, approved in 1946, authorizes the use of certain foreign currencies owed to or owned by the United States which are derived from the sale of war surplus property for educational exchanges between the United States and other countries.

[Department of State press release, Oct. 16, 1958]

SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES SIGN EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE AGREEMENT

Spain and the United States today signed an agreement putting into operation a new program of educational exchanges authorized by the Fulbright Act. The signing took place at Madrid, with Fernando Maria Castiella, Minister of Foreign Affairs, representing the Spanish Government and John Lodge, Ambassador of the United States, representing the U.S. Government.

The agreement provides for the expenditure over a 3-year period of Spanish currency equivalent to $600,000 received from the sale of surplus agricultural products in Spain to finance exchanges of persons between the two countries to study, conduct advanced research, teach, or to engage in other educational activities. The purpose of this program will be to further mutual understanding between the peoples of Spain and the United States through a wider exchange of knowledge and professional skills. Exchanges of persons under the Fulbright Act are carried out as a regular part of the international educational exchange program of the Department of State.

Under the terms of the agreement, a binational commission to be known as the Commission for Educational Exchange Between the United States and Spain will be established in Madrid to facilitate the administration of the program. The Commission's board of directors will consist of 10 members with equal representation as to Spanish and U.S. citizens, in addition to the U.S. Ambassador, who will serve as honorary chairman. All recipients of awards under the program authorized by the Fulbright Act are selected by the Board of Foreign Scholarships, whose members are appointed by the President of the United States. The Board maintains a secretariat in the Department of State.

With the signing of this agreement, Spain becomes the 40th country to participate in the educational exchange program authorized by the Fulbright Act. Approximately 33,000 exchanges have taken place since the legislation was enacted, a little over 10 years ago. Educational exchanges heretofore have been carried out with Spain under the Smith-Mundt Act, the U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948. The agreement signed today will considerably augment the present number of exchanges with that country. Following appointment of the members of the Commission in Madrid and the formulation of a program of operations, information about specific opportunities available will be released.

THE SOVIET SCIENTIFIC AND EDUCATIONAL CHALLENGES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, when Russia's sputnik jarred us awake to the harsh realities of our dwindling scientific supremacy, the Members of the Congress of the United States arose, almost as a body, with pledges of renewed effort and with glowing promises of vigorous endeavor toward recapturing our lost superiority.

Many among us expressed the fear that our inertia would be overcome—but momentarily, and that, like one who is awakened from a deep sleep by some minor disturbance, we would again subside into dreamland.

That this fear is becoming a reality is evidenced by a news article appearing in the Washington Post and Times Herald of January 18, 1959, which quotes Dr. Alan T. Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation, to the effect that our post-sputnik response to the Soviet scientific and educational challenges has been sadly inadequate.

Mr. President, I have no idea what must be done to awaken Americans to the unpleasant facts of life. As unwilling as I am to face it, perhaps the answer is that we simply do not wish to be disturbed. I do hope, however, that statements such as those contained in this article may have some effect.

I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I refer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WATERMAN DEPLORES APATHY ON SOVIET SCIENCE CHALLENGE

(By Sam Fogg)

Alan T. Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation, asserted yesterday the American people are making only an apathetic response to a determined Russian bid to achieve world scientific supremacy.

"As a nation, we appear to forget that we live in a competitive world and shall continue to do so," Waterman added. "It seems abundantly clear that we shall rapidly lose in competition unless we can show more determined and constructive efforts than we have during the past years."

He leveled his criticism in an annual report on the Foundation's activities which President Eisenhower submitted to Congress. The Foundation is the Government's chief agency for surveying the Nation's accomplishments in all fields of science.

SPIRIT LACKING

Waterman strongly deplored the U.S. post-sputnik response not only to the Soviet scientific challenge but on educational problems as well.

The United States has "only made a beginning" in meeting needs in both fields, the physicist said. "The major job is still to be done."

Waterman bluntly warned that other countries, notably Russia, are benefiting from "a determination and a national spirit on the part of the people which seems to be relatively absent from the American scene."

"We do not seem to understand," he said, "that it will be impossible to maintain our own prosperity and world peace unless we do and do promptly the things necessary to compete in a modern world."

Waterman grimly noted that American educators who have visited Russia report that the Soviet people see their way clear to world leadership in science and technology.

CHALLENGE IS CONTINUING

The Russian leaders see the possibility through scientific achievement of achieving world supremacy without the need of military domination, he added.

He demanded that the American people recognize that the challenge is not a single emergency but a continuing—possibly a permanent—one.

Waterman hit hard at the U.S. lag in education. He said there seems to be no immediate prospect of adequate salaries for teachers or improved incentives in recruiting new ones. And little is being done to provide adequate school facilities, he continued.

He pointed out that the Government's responsibility consists mainly of insuring that the public understands the problems involved, in providing direct support for some scientific projects, and in helping to encourage a substantial increase in funds from private sources.

OUR ICBM WEAKNESS

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, during the next few months the Congress will decide the makeup and amount of our defense budget for the fiscal year 1960.

The President has submitted his recommendation, and the committees will begin hearings on it.

Since the United States has not kept its defense strength modernized, during the next few years adequate defense requires more money than estimated in the President's budget for the fiscal year 1960.

I hope that this year there will be extensive public debate—and soon—over the scope of our planned defense effort.

This discussion is extremely important for the security of our country; because the coming year may afford us our last chance to initiate any real effort to catch up with the Russians in the most important fields of modern weaponry.

We may lose this chance unless the American people are given the truth about our present position.

The people cannot be expected to support such an effort if they do not know the facts. Once they do know them, they will demand that we move full speed ahead.

We in Congress are servants of the people. If we are to appropriate large sums of their money for defense, we must have the right reasons for doing so; and the people must know what those reasons are.

That is why, a week ago Monday, I called upon the Vice President to clarify what he had said about missiles at a private press conference—and to tell the American people where we plan to stand, some 2 years from now, in the intercontinental ballistic missile race with Russia.

Mr. NIXON had been reported by the press to have made certain statements about that subject which I know are wrong.

Even more important, they were statements which, if believed by our people, would lead them to reject the measures and expenditures necessary for our security.

For this reason, I called upon the Vice President to tell, in percentages, the facts about how many operational ICBM's this Nation plans to have as of 1961, as against what our intelligence experts estimate the Russians will probably have by that time.

Such a ratio would show clearly whether we are planning to close the missile gap by that time—or let it widen.

Since I made this request last January 12, many statements have come from many people.

Other reporters assert the Vice President did not say we were ahead, but did say we were taking adequate steps to close the gap.

The President of the United States has said we were behind the Russians in some things, but implied that our military defense overall was adequate because it was balanced.

The distinguished minority leader has implied on the floor of the Senate that whatever trouble we were in was the fault of the Truman administration, and not the fault of an administration which has been consistently reducing our relative defense strength over the past 6 years.

But the Vice President has said nothing; and no one in the administration has responded to my request for publication of this ICBM lag.

Therefore, to better inform the people, I will state a part of the record myself.

Mr. President, as every Member of this body knows, the ICBM is the most dreaded new weapon of modern war. In effect, it is a hydrogen bomb, deliverable with great speed and accuracy to targets anywhere on earth.

Just as Russia's possession of this weapon in quantity is fast becoming the greatest military danger facing America, so our capacity to retaliate with it effectively could be the greatest deterrent to war.

America will not strike first. Our traditions and our faith cry out against the instigation of a nuclear war.

In a recent editorial, the Washington Post put the matter well when it said:

> The crucial point is whether, when our chief reliance can no longer be placed on manned aircraft, we shall have enough missiles that we can survive a massive blow of aggression to confront an enemy with unacceptable levels of retaliation. This is the one basic requirement upon which deterrents of war must rest in the missile age.

That is why the relative number of ICBM's, as between ourselves and Russia, is so vital to our security. For if Russia has enough of these weapons to deliver a knockout blow, and we have not enough strength left to retaliate effectively, a major element of our defense strength, on which we have based the position of ourselves and our allies in this uneasy peace, crumbles.

Of course, the bombers of our Strategic Air Force, plus the new submarines now coming to us in carefully limited quantities, add to our deterrent capacity. But a majority of the planes in the former are obsolescent to obsolete; and our fleet of modern submarines is very small, especially when compared with the great submarine fleet of the Russians.

It is because of such reasons that our relative production position in the field of intercontinental missiles is of supreme importance.

What is that relative position? I speak now of operational ICBM's, which means ready and able to do the job they are supposed to do.

Our ICBM capacity represents what we plan to have; and when we plan to have them.

Russia's capacity is what we estimate they plan to have; and when they plan to have them.

Since I brought up the danger of this growing missile gap, there has been a substantial revision downward of our estimate of Russian missile production.

But let us take even these recently revised estimates and make a comparison of these new figures, as planned for 1961.

For safety, does our Government plan, by that date, to have twice as many ICBM's as we estimate the Russians will have?

It does not.

Does it plan to have as many ICBM's as Russia?

It does not.

Will the percentage of our ICBM inventory be half as large as the Russians in 1961?

It will not.

The Senate Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee plans hearings on our defense posture. The chairman of that committee, the distinguished majority leader, has called for an honest count.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may have 4 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Missouri is recognized for 4 additional minutes.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, in view of this imminent investigation, I will only say now that the figure is less than 25 percent.

In other words, through 1961, our planning envisages the Russians having over four times as many operational ICBM's as the United States.

I personally have studied this matter for many months, and believe that these figures actually much underestimate the Soviet long-range missile advantage now and over the next few years.

Accordingly, far from planning to close the current ICBM gap, the administration is actually allowing it to widen—and this despite all the vague reassurances we have heard to the contrary, in past years and again recently.

This gap will not exist because of any defect in technology or development. ICBMs have now been produced and test-fired successfully; and America's production lines could make many more of them during the next 2 years if funds to that end were appropriated and allocated now.

But our Government does not plan to run these lines on a full production basis.

In fact, during this period production capacity which could be used to make more ICBMs will be standing idle.

We have the capacity, not only to produce more missiles, but also to build in time the bases from which to fire them.

If Russia plans full production of this new weapon, and we do not, how can this missile gap do anything but widen against us?

The reason we are not planning full production of ICBMs is because this administration is not planning to spend the necessary funds.

The bugs in our missile production are not in our assembly lines, but in our policies.

If this administration really wanted to do so, it could start plans tomorrow to reduce the Russian advantage; and that is why it is so important for our people to have the facts; and to understand them.

Once that is true, the shocked outcry of an informed public will force our Government to take the necessary steps to start closing this ICBM gap.

It is mighty important for our people to realize the full implications of this Russian advantage in the ICBM race.

As long as we are outnumbered in ICBM's by over four to one, regardless of our defenses and other methods of retaliation, the United States is in grave danger of destruction from a sneak attack.

This does not even take into consideration the further gap widening in favor of the Russians that can only result from the present refusal of this administration to recognize the vital importance of adequate dispersal and properly protected bases for our presently planned ICBM's.

As long as this gap persists, it does grave damage to our entire diplomatic position; because in the world of today it is axiomatic that adequate national power is one of the primary requisites for effective international diplomacy.

As long as it persists, our alliances can only be weakened and the uncommitted nations made more uneasy; and Russia, along with her vast Chinese ally, will be better able to pursue their joint goal of undermining, subverting, and ultimately dominating the free world.

This is the real significance of this percentage—not only its effect on our security, but also its effect on our diplomatic position, all over the world.

It is primarily for that reason that I intend to discuss this matter further during the present session.

The leaders of our country act, not for themselves, but for the people.

The people of America are the ones who suffer from this lack of candor.

They are the ones who will be hurt if our country is weak.

They are the ones who will do the dying if our unpreparedness leads to a sneak attack.

Therefore, the people should be told the facts which are so important to their survival.

Vague reassurances will no longer do.

The truth is what counts—for the most vital requisite of a democracy is that the government be frank with the people.

Let us not confuse this issue by partisanship. Let us know now, objectively and on a nonpartisan basis, where we stand, and what we have to do.

If the administration does this now, there is still a little time to alert the Nation. If it refuses, then it is the duty of Congress to give the truth to the people.

The American people are eager to be adequately strong, in order that individually, and as a Nation, they can remain free.

Mr. President, only this morning I read in the newspapers of the press conference Secretary McElroy held yesterday, in which he said there is no positive evidence that the Soviet Union now has combat-ready ICBM's and that the Soviet Union is not expected to have such a 6,000-mile ballistic missile before this country's own Atlas is, as he put it, "ready for combat by June 30 of this year."

The implication of these and other remarks made by Secretary McElroy yesterday is that the Soviets do not have superiority in intercontinental ballistic missiles.

This statement by the Secretary implies a great deal more combat readiness on the part of the United States than is justified by the very few ICBM's this country will have available for retaliation in the next 2 years.

The Secretary's statements are apparently based on a recent downward revision in intelligence estimates of Soviet ICBM capability for the next 3 or 4 years.

Nothing could be more certain to lessen our chances of survival than to subordinate our intelligence evaluation to our budget policies.

Yet, since we have not been told by the administration of any evidence of softening in the Soviet position or a deemphasis on its ICBM program over the past several months, are we to assume that such statements as Mr. McElroy's of yesterday are released for public consideration primarily to support a restricted budget position?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to commend the very able Senator from Missouri for the thoroughness and aggressiveness with which he has pursued this subject, with the result of bringing before the Senate the record of what has happened in regard to this subject.

PREPAREDNESS HEARINGS BY THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES AND COMMITTEE ON AERONAUTICAL AND SPACE SCIENCES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Preparedness of the Committee on Armed Services and as chairman of the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, I am pleased to announce that near the end of the month those two committees will begin hearings on the general subject of our country's preparedness. We plan to have our first hearing on January 29.

Our goal will be to give the people of America a forthright answer to a vital question: Where does this Nation stand in the fields of national defense and outer space?

The committee will proceed toward this goal with the same nonpartisan candor that it did last year.

Overriding all other issues is the necessity of insuring two things:

One, that this Nation is now doing all that it can and should do to protect this country and the rest of the free world against aggression.

Two, that the United States has marshaled the last iota of brains and manpower to assure this Nation's supremacy in outer space.

This must be done.

Our initial effort will be directed to the immediate problem of clearing the confusion that presently exists about where this Nation stands in the race for outer space.

The people must have an honest count.

We propose to start with Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy as the first witness, to be followed by his senior responsible subordinate. This will be the start.

The entire defense and space programs will be under scrutiny by the appropriate committees throughout the remainder of the session.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] has made a great contribution to his colleagues, and I thank him for the exposition he has made.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, let me thank the distinguished majority leader for what he has said. It has been a privilege to work with him for many years in this field.

As I stated in the course of the brief remarks I have made on this subject today, I am confident that under his leadership the American people will now find where they stand with respect to the growing menace of communism.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, if I may be recognized, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although I shall not object—I point out that we are still proceeding in the morning hour, under a 3-minute limitation; and some of us only wish to make insertions in the RECORD. I wonder whether we can make those insertions, after which the Senator from South Dakota can be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope that can be done. I suggested that no speeches of more than 3 minutes be made during the morning hour. I think it inconveniences Senators to have any other procedure followed.

At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Dakota may retain the floor and may yield to his colleagues for the purpose of making insertions in the RECORD, without having the time required for that purpose charged to the 3 minutes available to him.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I appreciate that; but when I am recognized, I should like to be accorded additional time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from South Dakota may be sure of our courtesy in that respect.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to say to the Senator from South Dakota that I would not make any objection. However, inasmuch as what I wish to say will take considerably less than 3 minutes, and bears directly on what the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Texas have said, I should like to have an opportunity to be recognized first, if the Senator from South Dakota will yield, because I am sure he may wish to make some comments on the facts on this subject which I should like to place in the RECORD.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, let me state that it will be my intention to yield first to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who has an engagement downtown, and who merely wishes to make an insertion in the RECORD. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming and to other Senators.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say to the Senator from South Dakota that if his unanimous-consent request is granted, I shall ask that, first, other Senators be permitted to introduce bills and to submit statements in connection with them, and that then the debate on national-defense policy be resumed. I, too, would like to engage in it. But, like the Senator from Oregon, other Senators have commitments; and the morning hour is for the purpose of the introduction of bills, the presentation of petitions, and the submission of resolutions; and I wish to get on with that job.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to observe that, by courtesy, no objection was made when additional time was requested by the Senator from Missouri. I believe that most of us would like to participate in the debate on the subject discussed by the Senator from Missouri, and we would prefer to have that debate occur following the morning hour. But since it has not, we wish to make these remarks.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I, too, agree that morning business should be concluded before the debate on national-defense policy is continued. But several of us, including my friend, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and myself, I know would like to interrogate the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri. So I hope the unanimous-consent agreement that is worked out will provide that the Senator from Missouri will be able to resume the floor after the morning hour is completed, so that we can continue our colloquy with him, after which I think it would be quite appropriate for the Senator from South Dakota to be recognized.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, if I am recognized, I should like to yield first to the Senator from Oregon, under my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to know what the schedule is; otherwise, I shall object. I wish to know whether we are to proceed with morning business or whether we are to engage in debate on national-defense matters.

Let me ask the Senator from South Dakota what his purpose is.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I intend to make a few observations with respect to the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I favor that. But when does the Senator from South Dakota wish to do so? Will he yield to the rest of us, in order that we may make insertions in the RECORD, during the morning hour; or will we have to wait for the debate on national-defense matters to end?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not wish to request any courtesy other than the one accorded the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to explain that I asked the Senator from Missouri not to make his remarks until the morning hour was concluded. I realized that the statement would provoke just such a situation as the one which has developed.

I was away from the floor when the Senator from Missouri sought and received recognition. I thought it only courteous to him, after he had been recognized, to see to it that he received additional time, in order to be able to complete his very brief statement.

I then sought recognition under the 3-minute rule; and I completed my statement before my time was up.

I recognize the problem the Senator from Oregon has; and I wish my colleagues would join me in attempting to get us out of the procedural hassle we are in—through no fault of my own—by permitting the Senator from South Dakota to receive recognition, whereupon he will yield to the Senator from Oregon, to permit him to make a brief insertion in the RECORD. That procedure will at least enable the Senator from Oregon to leave and then we shall proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. But, Mr. President, I wish to know whether the Senator from South Dakota will then yield to me, because I, too, have another engagement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am sure the Senator from South Dakota will be courteous enough to give the Senator from Minnesota a very high priority.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want more than a very high priority; I want some assurance. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to introduce bills?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; and I wish to obtain that assurance.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, let me inquire whether all Senators who wish recognition during the morning hour are now on their feet.

Mr. MANSFIELD. No. I have been waiting since 12 o'clock.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I recognize the situation which has developed. I do not wish to be selfish about this matter. If I can be assured that Senators who are presently on the floor will not, if recognized during the morning hour, exceed one 3-minute period, I shall withdraw my request, with the understanding that I shall be recognized after Senators who desire to be recognized during the morning hour have been allowed 3 minutes, and 3 minutes only, whether to speak on one subject or to speak on half a dozen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). Without objection——

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I regret that this procedural problem has come up today. As all Senators, know, the morning hour is seldom adhered to rigidly.

I have been in the Senate Chamber on occasions when 45 minutes had elapsed; we were still in the morning hour; and only two Senators had made remarks. However, I state sincerely that I regret that this awkward situation has developed.

I am especially sorry to have inconvenienced the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and any others of my colleagues who may have appointments elsewhere at this time.

I had no advance notice from the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that he wished to pursue this serious defense matter with me this morning.

I can only add that, much as I regret the present procedural difficulty, I regret very much more the seriousness of our defense posture.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I am perfectly willing to accede to the request of the Senator from South Dakota that he may proceed, and also to permit other Senators to proceed under the 3-minute rule. But I was in the Chamber, I believe, before any other Senator who now is on the floor was present.

Earlier in the day I learned from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] that he expected to speak. I told him that I would wait until he concluded his remarks before I would request the floor.

I conferred with the assistant majority leader, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and asked him to suggest the absence of a quorum, if necessary, when the Senator from Missouri was ready to proceed.

I am perfectly willing to await the conclusion of all bona fide morning-hour business. But I expect to be heard after that has been concluded, before we get into any prolonged discussion of the wild spaces outside our universe which seem to excite such great interest at this time.

A few of us have some mundane matters which we want to discuss.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota recognizes the situation. Rather than have a nervous audience waiting and delayed on this matter, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized first immediately after the morning hour, when we would not be talking under a limitation of time, and would have more time to speak. I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized first after the completion of the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, would the Senator yield me 5 minutes at that time? I have been waiting since 12 o'clock.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota would be delighted to yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that he has already agreed to yield to me for less than 3 minutes immediately afterward.

This is one of those amusing situations which develop on the floor of the Senate, I would say to the Presiding Officer [Mr. HARTKE], who is one of the freshman Senators. We waste more time on procedural matter, seeking to get in our opportunities to speak, than we waste on any other subject that comes before the Senate.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the Senator from South Dakota may be recognized, he intends to keep his commitment to the Senator from Wyoming. The Senator is under the impression that no one will be recognized under the unanimous consent. If the junior Senator from South Dakota is recognized and his unanimous consent is granted, he will still have the floor, under the morning hour. Under that arrangement he will immediately yield to the Senator from Oregon and then to the Senator from Wyoming, and then relinquish the floor until he can have recognition after the morning hour.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, are we in the morning hour or are we not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are in the morning hour.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Nobody has to yield to anyone.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I object, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I have asked for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is this the morning hour or is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have asked for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized, under the regular order, for no longer than 3 minutes.

(Mr. MORSE made unanimous consent requests, which appear elsewhere in the RECORD.)

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Within the 3-minute rule, I desire first to compliment the Senator from Missouri on his statement and the Senator from Texas on his statement with respect to intercontinental ballistic missiles. I have in my hand a document issued in August 1953 by the Senate Appropriations Committee. It is entitled "A Comparison of Original Estimates and Revised Estimates, 1954, by Departments in Regular Bills."

The President of the United States who held office until January 1953, by the name of Harry Truman, sent a budget message to the Senate in January calling for the appropriation of $40,719,931,000 for the Department of Defense.

His successor, President Dwight Eisenhower, formerly Chief of Staff of the Army, canceled the budget sent to Congress by his predecessor and, in his revised budget for the fiscal year 1954, he cut the appropriation for Defense by $4,948,368,000, sending to Congress a total budget of $35,771,563,000.

This is the manner in which the present administration launched its campaign for the defense of the United States—by cutting down the recommendation which had been made by the previous President for strengthening the defenses of the country.

On page 15 of this document, there is the following comparison dealing with the development of the Air Force. The Truman budget for aircraft and related production called for $6,664,000,000. The Eisenhower budget called for $3,495,000,000. That represented a reduction of $3,169,000,000.

In major procurement other than aircraft, Dwight Eisenhower made a reduction of $275 million.

In Air Force maintenance and operation, he cut the budget by $1,035,000,000.

And above all things, Mr. President, for research and development by the Air Force—and at that time this was the appropriation necessary for missile development—the Truman budget was $537 million. The Eisenhower budget was $475 million, or a reducion of $62 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY and Mr. CARLSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

FURNISHING OF NATURAL GAS TO NORTHERN MINNESOTA—RESOLUTION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the resolution adopted by the village of Nashwauk, Minn., urging the Federal Power Commission to speedily process the current applications for permission to furnish natural gas to northern Minnesota.

The Power Commission has had applications for this purpose before it for more than 2 years now, while the people of Minnesota have been waiting for additional supplies of natural gas.

Let us hope that there will be a final decision made in the near future, as I have so frequently urged the Commission to do.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas it is now more than 20 years since the first application was made to the Federal Power Commission for a certificate of necessity to install a pipeline and furnish natural gas to the Iron Range of northern Minnesota, and

"Whereas this fuel is vitally necessary for use in processing the lower grade iron ores so abundant in the village of Nashwauk and its immediate vicinity, and

"Whereas the lack of this fuel for use in beneficiating the low grade iron ores is causing serious unemployment in the village of Nashwauk and its surrounding areas: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Village Council of the village of Nashwauk, Itasca County, Minn., That they go on record as petitioning and requesting the Federal Power Commission to speedily process the applications for permission to furnish natural gas to this area and that they request the Members of Congress from this area and the State of Minnesota to do all in their power to aid the Iron Range communities in obtaining natural gas service for the area; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable HUBERT M. HUMPHREY and the Honorable EUGENE MCCARTHY, Senators from the State of Minnesota, and the Honorable JOHN A. BLATNIK, Member of Congress from this district, to acquaint them with the action of the village council."

The foregoing resolution was duly offered and seconded and upon being put to a vote, carried unanimously.

Mayor Williams thereupon declared said resolution duly adopted this 5th day of January 1959.

ERNEST WILLIAMS,
Mayor.

Attest:

RAY ROOS,
Clerk.

MATTIE CAPEHART

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from the State of Indiana has suffered the loss of his dear friend and stepmother, Mattie Capehart. She was born in Pike County, Ind., which is the native county of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and of myself.

She had lived there all her life and died after a long and useful life on Monday, January 19, 1959, at the age of 91 years. On behalf of all the people of the State of Indiana, we extend to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and his family our sincere sympathy.

NEED FOR SOIL TREATMENT MEASURES

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, at a meeting of the board of directors of the State Association of Kansas Watersheds on Friday, January 29, 1959, at Emporia, Kans., the following resolution was passed unanimously:

Be it resolved, That the State Association of Watersheds recommend that sufficient funds and personnel be provided to local counties to carry out soil treatment measures to complete watershed work.

Mr. President, the preservation of our soil and the control of water runoff is our No. 1 problem in Kansas. Great progress has been made during the past few years and I would recommend to the members of the Appropriations Committee that every effort be made to furnish sufficient funds for not only the continuation of this work, but for an expansion of it.

PRINTING OF COMMITTEE REPORTS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, with reference to the printing of committee activity reports for the session, I wish to remind the chairmen of all committees that the Joint Committee on Printing has very properly ruled that the printing of such reports both as committee prints and in the RECORD is duplication, the cost of which cannot be justified.

It is requested that committee chairmen decide whether they wish these reports printed as committee prints or in the RECORD since the Government Printing Office will be directed not to print them both ways.

This restriction does not apply to the legislative achievement reports of the session made by the majority and minority leaders, which reports are printed in the RECORD and as Senate documents.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, has the morning hour been concluded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARTKE in the chair). Is there further morning business?

PROPOSED INCREASE OF OIL AND GAS LEASE RENTALS—DISPOSITION OF OIL AND GAS DEPOSITS IN CERTAIN LAND ACQUIRED BY THE UNITED STATES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I note from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that there was transmitted to the Senate earlier this week a recommendation from the Department of the Interior for the enactment of legislation to increase oil and gas lease rentals to 50 cents an acre across the board. It will be recalled that the rentals are now 50 cents for the first year, nothing for the second and third years, 25 cents for the fourth and fifth years, and 50 cents for the 5-year renewal period.

I know that all Senators representing oil-producing States will regard with some concern the suggestion coming from the Department of the Interior that the present rentals be increased, inasmuch as it it our purpose to stimulate oil production and the search for oil deposits.

I make this announcement at the present time merely to call this subject to the attention of Senators who are members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and to emphasize the importance of this proposal.

Another measure proposed by the administration would give the Secretary of the Interior blank check authority—and I particularly invite the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] to this—to dispose of oil and gas deposits in acquired land in which the United States owns only a partial or a future interest.

If the administration is recommending the disposal of Government oil interests in acquired land, and is recommending also the disposal of the petroleum reserves, one of the largest of which is in the State of California, it is clearly necessary for us who represent oil producing States and who are members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to consider what is in the mind of the administration in disposing of these capital assets which the United States possesses.

ECONOMICS BY ADMONITION

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a searching analysis of "Economics by Admonition," by Dr. Ben W. Lewis, of Oberlin College. Dr. Lewis testified this morning before the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, and has given an anlysis of the problems of inflation, competition, and regulation of commerce which is worthy of deep reflection.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMICS BY ADMONITION

Recent years have witnessed the display of some questionable manners toward persons in high places. These persons, even (particularly) the person in the very highest place, have been admonishing leaders of industry and leaders of labor to look upon the precarious state of our sound economy, imperiled by burgeoning inflation and yawning recession, to commune with their consciences in the vast stillness imposed by the solemn responsibility which is theirs, and voluntarily to restrain, even to reverse, their age-old propensities and proclivities in the matter of prices and wages. The admonitions have been reinforced by fearsome warnings: the cost of failure to heed will be the loss of our way of life.

ADMONITIONS GO UNHEEDED

The response has been not only less than spectacular, it has been less than perceptible. It isn't that people do not listen or that they disagree with the admonitions delivered to others. Indeed, when our leaders of industry and labor see these admonitions being ignored by other leaders of labor and industry they are noticeably distressed. But, nothing happens. As for the rest of us, we applaud the recitation of the noble lines, and hiss the villains whose selfish conduct flouts their direction; but when in due course we are admonished, in the name of our way of life, to stem the flood of inflation by spending less than we want to spend, we wave our checkbooks; and when we are admonished to break the bonds of recession by spending more than we are then inclined to spend, we sit on our hands. All of this is very disrespectful to those in high places, and may very well lead to dire consequences. Some of us are reminded of another time, a quarter century ago, when we failed to follow the admonitions of another highly placed person upon the occasion of another threat to our way of life. We were told in 1929–30 that if we would all act as though we were employed and prosperous and confident of the future, we could rub our eyes and the depression would be gone. And if we didn't * * * well, we didn't; and what happened to our way of life generated about two-thirds of the content of our present-day economics textbooks.

Admonitions are not new to us, although in our economic milieu they are always a little startling. Business statesmen have been admonishing other business leaders for the past 20 years to rise to the challenge of business statesmanship. They have raised their eyes above and beyond the market place to the distant stars, and have asked the stars, "What is our responsibility to society?" In the interval of waiting for the answer they have enjoined their fellows, in the name of our way of life, also to gaze wistfully skyward, to search out their consciences, and to embrace social responsibility as the standard and guide of business conduct. Let the record show that the stars are still blinking.

There is, of course, some point to this concern about our way of life. It seems evident that our way of life is right now undergoing substantial change—a change reflected in the very fact of the admonitions themselves. Our way of life is geared to gain, not to goodness.

ECONOMIZING INVOLVES DISPOSING OF CONFLICTING CLAIMS

The way of life which our more persistent admonishers are admonishing us to preserve is our economic way of life—our way of economizing, our economic system. May I suggest that creeping admonitionism is wholly foreign to our economic way of life, and that economizing by conscience is a system of, and not a cure for, organic disabilities which are beginning to be plainly discernible in our economic body.

Please indulge me for a moment while I remind myself that an economic system, a political economy, is a set of man-made and man-accepted arrangements designed to economize our natural and human resources; that is, to bring about the constant and continuing use of these resources as men, in society, want them to be used. Since, even on this most affluent of all planets, not all of the desires, however induced, of everyone can possibly be satisfied, conflicts of economic interest are bound to arise and must be resolved. Choices and decisions acceptable to society must be made and carried into effect continuously and in volume. We are forced by the basic conditions of our life together to economize our resources and, thus, to establish and everlastingly to reestablish arrangements suited to the performance of the economizing task as we want it performed.

Economizing by its very nature involves the disposition of conflicting claims, all of which may be reasonable and good. All economic decisions are related and interdependent, and if our decisions are well taken, we purchase our satisfactions at the cost of other satisfactions foregone. Economic decisions carry denials with every approval, refusals with every grant. This, of course, is why we care, why we economize. This is why society as a whole—all of society—is concerned with economizing decisions. This is why economizing is society's business.

ECONOMIC SYSTEM INVOLVES CONTROL OVER BEHAVIOR OF INDIVIDUALS

There is another reason why the business of economizing is society's business. Any economic system—market, Marxist, or mixed—involves control by society over the behavior of individuals. An economy points the way and sees to it that the way is followed. Its weapons and sanctions may be direct or indirect, sharp or blunt, but their function is clear: to make individuals behave as society wants them to behave and as they would be quite unlikely to behave in the absence of society's economic controls. It is the function of controls to control, to be unpleasant and even to hurt; and so to affect the actions of individuals. This is true both of the directives and legal penalties of authoritarian systems and the price-cost directives and coercion-by-competition that characterize free-enterprise economies. But, whatever the arrangements and forces, they represent the application of socially sanctioned power to the behavior of individuals; they can properly express no will or purpose other than the will and purpose of society.

SOCIETY MUST SET THE PATTERN

Economizing, then, is society's affair. The problem is society's problem, and society must set the standards and provide the answers either by naming the standards and spelling out the answers directly through its political machinery, or indirectly by establishing or acquiescing in a set of processes to produce answers which are acceptable because the processes from which they derive are accepted. It is neither the privilege nor the responsibility of any individual, however conscientious or statesmanlike, voluntarily to render economizing decisions in the name of society.

The economic system in operation in any country at any time represents the way in which the people of that country, at that time and as they are then persuaded, want the economizing function in their society to be performed. In our own case, we place heavy reliance upon the forces of (1) free individual initiative and choice, (2) economic (profit) motivation, and (3) unrestrained rivalry (competition) between independent, profit-seeking sellers and between independent, profit-seeking or satisfaction-seeking buyers. Through these forces we hope to achieve optimum use of our resources in the directions we desire, and the division and use of the products of our resources as we want them divided and used. The rationale of the process is simply that although everyone is seeking maximum gain free from conscious control by the group, each is, nevertheless, forced by the competition of others similarly motivated to offer to the market the best of which he is capable (as the market measures best), not alone to make the greatest gain, but in order economically to survive. Under this philosophy, we abhor any substantial lessening of competition as opening the door to the violation of society's pattern of resource use and enjoyment, and as derogating from society in favor of individuals the performance of the economizing function which society alone is competent to perform.

WE CHANGE OUR ECONOMIC SYSTEM CONSTANTLY

Competitive profit seeking in the free market is the core of our economizing process, but we have never been satisfied and happy with the core alone. All economic systems are made from day to day; they undergo constant modification and revision to accomplish the economic purposes which men, in their own time and their own environment, deem to be good. The machinery for establishing and changing the formal structure of the economy is political, and it is invoked whenever enough people are moved to call it into operation on specific issues. Whenever enough of us become dissatisfied with the structure or processes of the economy as it exists, or displeased with the results which it produces, we exercise our collective political will—we economize consciously by government. Sometimes we seek through government to make the market itself operate more effectively as an economizing instrument; sometimes we move positively into the market with our sleeves rolled up and force the economic verdicts which, collectively, we want, but which the market by itself is not prepared to deliver. Through government we supplement the market; we also supplant the market. Our total, overall economy, thus, is a complex and constantly changing mixture of profit seeking, competitively controlled individualism and conscious, governmentally organized and operated collectivism, built up piece by piece, to serve the desires of our politically free people as they express their desires in political economic decisions. It exemplifies, if exemplification is needed, the proposition that economizing is society's business.

In the context and within the rationale of our way of economic life, it is the social role of the individual to seek the maximum personal gain which the system will permit him to take. The laborer serves the goals of the economy when he seeks high wages, as do individual farmers and businessmen when they seek to maximize their profits. Let us be quite clear on this: Profit seeking is not only acceptable to our way of life, it is indispensable. The forms and methods which profit seeking may appropriately adopt are conditioned, of course, by circumstances and by the mores of the time, as well as by laws, but the logic of our economy will not permit the drive of profit motivation to be blunted or its direction to be diffused by the social conscience of individuals. Never, except in confusion, do we call upon individually felt social responsibility as a central economizing force.

ADMONITIONISM RESULTS FROM CONFUSION

Does it, then, indicate confusion to admonish business and labor leaders and the rest of us to ignore market warnings and considerations of self-interest, and to take off on courses which for each of us as individuals can lead only to economic disaster, in the hope that, if each moves toward disaster, all will be saved? Does it suggest confusion to admonish us as individuals voluntarily to forego economic satisfactions in order that all may be more fully satisfied? It certainly does. And it indicates confusion confounded, indeed it is the cream of the jest, to assume that anyone is listening. The jest is really creamed by the circumstance that the admonitions are offered in the name of our way of life.

It is difficult to conceive that markets made up of completely altruistic buyers and sellers, moved by admonitions to grasp solely at the fleeting forms of economic goodness as they may manifest themselves to each individual through a misty emanation of social responsibility, could possibly do an economizing job for society, even if such people could be trained or bred. Yet admonitions continue to ring out, and the very authority of their source compels us to consider the nature of the confusion they seem so patently to mirror. Preference by the White House for admonitions rather than action by the Government may stem from genuine doubt as to the capacity of the Government to perform effectively in the premises, or from the realization that execution of society's formal economic controls is bound, at best, to be a distressingly unpleasant business (only a sadist with a lifetime appointment could really be happier with a hatchet than a trumpet). Again, admonitions may be preferred because of a basic social-philosophic aversion to compulsion where persuasion offers even a remote chance to gain passable results. With less charity, we may also note that admonitions may be employed to divert unwanted attention from unwanted problems, or even simply to delay, if not to forestall, the making of difficult decisions. The preference of business leaders for admonitions may reflect messianic complexes or simply an entirely understandable aversion to letting government in on the act in any role that involves restraint on managerial discretion.

Whatever the explanation, the persistent flow of admonitions strongly suggests a very disturbed state of mind on the part of those in high Government and business places—their growing suspicion that things in the economy are getting out of hand and that something needs to be done about it that the free market, unassisted, cannot be expected to accomplish. The fact that weakened faith in the processes of the free market may be explicitly denied, if, indeed, it is even recognized, is itself an indication of the prevailing confusion. This confusion, however, is not without its encouraging aspects; it is top-drawer, not mine-run confusion; it stems from insight, dimly seen.

ADMONITION TO BUSINESS HIGHLIGHTS CONFUSION

Calls to business statesmanship, which have much in common with but which are of a different order from admonitions delivered to the rest of us as consumers, reflect this confusion and tremulous insight most sharply. It is quite possible that our admonishers are catching a glimpse of a phenomenon which many observers of the American economy have been commenting on for many years, but increasingly of late: The decision-making, economizing processes in the free enterprise sector of our economy do not consist alone of millions upon millions of individual choices meshed into social-economic decisions by the impersonal processes of the market. In significant proportions, society's economizing decisions are made, out of hand, by relatively few people who sit above the market in key positions within huge conglomerates of economic power. I suggest that the admonishers are beginning to sense the fact and the significance of the possession by a few of great power over the economy, and are advising and pleading that this power be used responsibly in the broad social interest. This admonition reflects and imparts confusion, but to the extent that it may serve to galvanize our limp attention to a condition which can use all of the active consideration we are able to spare, its net effect may be good. Wrong iron, wrong fairway, but a good shot.

Bigness in the economy is upon us; big business and big labor stare us in the face. Suppose we shade our eyes and stare back—in this paper at big business.

BIG BUSINESS HAS IMPORT ON ECONOMY

It is high time to take stock of the effect of big units upon the ability of the market to perform its economizing function. Bigness is not an exact concept, but, fortunately, the purposes of our present inquiry do not require us to define it with laboratory precision. We can busy ourselves usefully with the clearly recognizable dimensions of bigness; we need not fret over the exact reach or tensile strength of its outermost tentacles. Let's settle for what Berle, in his "Twentieth Century Capitalist Revolution," refers to as "concentrates"; and let us, for just a few precious moments, turn off the IBM machines and revel in an abstention from ponderous debate over statistical measures of concentration. Our attention will be sufficiently focused if we hold it to a consideration of business units which all of us clearly recognize as big enough to enjoy the power of investment, output, wage, and selling policies that have identifiable, substantial effects upon the markets in which they deal, and, hence, upon all whose lives are conditioned by those markets.

This definition of bigness may foretell, but it has not forced my own conclusions on the policy issue which bigness requires us to face—whether the presence in our markets of giant concentrates leaves enough natural, self-generating, unchecked, and uncheckable drive in market competition to enable it to discharge to our satisfaction the compelling, coercive, directive, regulatory, economizing task which the logic of free enterprise requires it to carry. I hasten to note that the issue does not relate to the guilt or innocence of bigness—its goodness or badness in the conventional moral sense; the issue is one of economic architecture. Competition plays an indispensable role in a free market economy; to the extent that the pressures of competition are lessened and diffused by concentrates, economic decisions are left to a handful of persons who are not responsible by ballot, contract, or market to those whose lives are substantially conditioned by the decisions. Hence, the issue: As we look ahead in the building of our economy, may we reasonably, and are we likely, to continue our heavy reliance upon competition in the ordering of our economic affairs as we want them ordered?

POWER OF BIGNESS INCOMPATIBLE WITH FREE COMPETITION

This issue will not allow us the luxury of a single indisputable conclusion, scientifically established and secured by irrefutable evidence. For nearly 3 score years and 10 under the Sherman Act we have picked, plied, poked, and pondered the evidence bearing on bigness and competition in our economy, but only rarely have our pronouncements been inexorably dictated by these processes. When definitive declarations are called for, we wrap our arms tightly around our value judgments and jump. As I jump, I am peculiarly conscious of the swelling chorus of appeals to responsible business statesmanship, and I am reminded again that businessmen are free to practice the prerogatives of business statesmanship only to the extent that they are free from the compulsions of competition. It is my unabashed personal value judgment that in a growing number of key spots in our economy big units possess, and will continue to possess, a degree of power over the market incompatible with our confident acceptance of competition as our economizing force.

Big firms differ in the degree of their insulation from competition, but it seems probable that the differences in some cases are more apparent than real, and that, in others, more power and pomp will accrue with circumstance. No firm is absolutely impregnable, of course, and occasionally one slips and loses its position on the fortune scoreboard. Many forces are at work in this area, and it is far from clear that functional competition is the most common or the most powerful of the lot; certainly its dependability as an economizing force is not established by these shifts. Nor is the presence or strength of competition convincingly shown by the fact that giant firms may upon occasion adopt and follow a competitive routine—may make competitive motions, may choose deliberately to stop short of monopoly, or as a matter of management policy may institute competition among their company branches or divisions. The test is whether the big firm is compelled to compete, whether it is driven by competition in its quest for maximum gain or survival.

The claim advanced when prices are rigid that in this industry price competition has been supplanted by quality or service competition is less than convincing. Typically, all dimensions of the bargain are important, and in an effectively competitive market no participant can be free from apprehension that price competition will explode and persist. An atmosphere of certainty as to the forms which competition will take suggests that competition itself is under wraps. This observation bears, too, on the claim that the absence of price competition is not important as long as men and firms continue competitively to innovate. Innovation obviously occurs, but in what measure it is to be attributed to competition is not clear. Neither is it clear that power to act independently of competition in price is not also power to control the degree and direction of innovation. Competition on leash to conventions that happen to be agreeable to the competitors is, simply, not competition.

Nor is competition demonstrated to be present—indeed, quite the contrary is true—by instances in which giant firms hold prices in check in the face of rising markets. Such exhibitions may stroke our consumer sensibilities, but they still exude the aroma of power even though it may be power soothingly applied.

POWER OF BIGNESS HAS INCREASED IN RECENT YEARS

But, is bigness more threatening now than in the past? Is there any evidence that bigness is on the increase? Scientific measures of the extent of industrial concentration are not conclusive, but it is certainly apparent that the quality, and hence the significance, of the economic power now concentrated in giant firms is markedly different from that of yesterday, and that today's bigness is far more impressive. A half-century ago, bigness was a brash newcomer fighting its way doggedly into the economy, clawing, biting, slugging, stomping to gain power over the market. Its predatory practices were limited only by its unrestrained ambition and its fertile imagination; and it was on these practices that the public fastened its critical attention. Our concern then (much as now, unfortunately, although then with more reason) was business morality. The rules were being made to relate less to the position and role of bigness in the economy than to the conduct by which bigness was being built. Lured by the vistas promised by scale, we were eager to embrace bigness whose practices did not offend our standards of business morality; and we were prepared by easy transference to open our arms to bigness which although its past might have been questionable, had seen the white light of faith and had purged itself of youthful transgressions by confession and pledges. But our arms were not yet opened wide, and our attitude was still one of fas-

Bigness today has made its way. It has arrived, and, generously, it has accepted and make.

Bigness today has made its way. It has arrived, and, generously, it has accepted and is doing the very best it can with the rest of the economy. It is bigger; in absolute terms, bigness today is really big. Its roots are deep into, indeed they have become a part of the foundation rock of the economy, and they are reaching into areas thought at one time to be unfriendly to their growth. The behavior of bigness today is spotless, at least no spots remain unremoved for long; and its appearance and demeanor are attractive and ingratiating. Tutored by its attorneys, bathed, barbered, and cosmeticized by Madison Avenue, nourished and sanctified by war and cold war, and enthroned by public opinion which sees only goodness in bigness that is well-mannered and well-behaved, bigness exhibits the supreme confidence and gracious assurance that bespeak stature, status, and a clear conscience. Bigness was once the "bad boy in Sunday school"; now it "sits on the vestry." It may not yet have acquired a full-sized soul, but the contract has been let and the press has been alerted. Bigness spreads its protective arms benevolently over thousands of small less-favored firms, and dispenses justice among them as it is given to see justice. It keeps them alive (in the aggregate) and in the main tolerably happy—and in line. Bigness is here and, what distinguishes its present from its earlier position, we all know that bigness is here to stay. I suggest that competition, today, is captive to bigness—that today's competition is more controlled than controlling, its temper lessened, its tautness gone slack.

BIGNESS GROWS DESPITE ANTITRUST REGULATIONS

What of the future? Where do we go from here?

What are the possibilities of antitrust as an instrument for tailoring bigness to a pattern which will renew and sustain our faith in the economizing processes of competition. I would be the last to assert that competition over the years has not been made more pervasive and effective by the energies that have been devoted to antitrust. Certainly I do not decry the current efforts by scholars, lawyers, and officials to sharpen and to add iron both to our thinking and our operating policies. But, even when I follow the skillful analysis presented in Corwin Edwards' extremely able defense of the antitrust approach, "Big Business and the Policy of Competition," my footsteps falter as I near the jumping-off place. He is concerned, as I am, with power. He believes that "where we can identify power that impairs competition, we should strike it down," and he argues cogently for a case-by-case approach through the courts, the test in each case to be not "the quality of business performance, but the existence of adequate competition." This leaves us (as it should) with market structure as virtually our only test, but we have found no way to test the test, or to appraise the cost, in other values foregone, of employing it. We have searched long and our search continues, but neither our logic nor our experience gives us grounds for great expectations.

It is increasingly evident, as we inch tediously and at great expense from one elaborate, "definitive" antitrust case to the next, that the headway we are making is pitiful. Sometimes antitrust holds the line, sometimes it even gains a yard; but most of the time it plays in the shadow of its own goalposts. Each case is necessarily freighted with rarefied shadings and emphases which, while entirely relevant to the rights and claims under litigation, tend cumulatively to blur and dilute, rather than to firm our public policy toward bigness. We are required by the very nature of antitrust to strive for microscopic distinctions, to split hairs and then to split the splits. Each decision raises a sprawling litter of new issues bawling for more decisions; it is a rare case that does not generate as much in confusion as it produces in clarity. In the meantime, bigness grows apace. We can't see the mass for the increments; we nibble at the trees while the forest spreads and flourishes. A good part of our trouble is this very forest; it has its attractive aspects; it is, in fact, rather inviting.

"WORKABLE COMPETITION" FALLS DOWN IN PRACTICE

A word about "workable competition." I apologize for delaying until now my assurance to you that I do not seek after the false idol of "perfect competition." I ask you to believe that, in common with all faithful workers in the vineyard, I take the oath of disavowal each morning upon rising and, facing Morningside Heights, do obeisance only to "workable competition." Of late, however, even "workable competition" is beginning to pall. We embrace workable competition as our standard for antitrust analysis and policy, but it grows increasingly evident that the operating features and properties of "workable" defy identification except in terms that beg the question, and that the boundaries of "competition" are being broadened to include everything that businessmen do in the market together with most of the forces from which their doings derive. I suspect that, put to the test of serving as a guide to antitrust policy, "workable competition" rarely proves to be more definitive than "the total indeterminate combination of practices, motivations and forces operating in the market, with which, nursing our confusions, we are currently willing to live." The fact is that the concept "workable competition" is not particularly workable.

BIGNESS KEEPS PUSHING

Perhaps this is the best we can do, and—who knows?—it may work! I really doubt, however, whether playing cops and robbers with bigness will, in the long run, provide us with much more than stimulating intellectual exercise, profits for professional participants, emotional release, and a kind of rearguard protection as we move slowly toward the next waterhole. Antitrust will continue in its piecemeal way to prevent gross overreaching by industrial giants, but it cannot be geared to cope with the basic problems raised by bigness as a permanent feature of our economy. And bigness will be permanent. Because of antitrust, it will push its way more discreetly, but between cases it will keep on pushing. We will not cut it down by legislation setting arbitrary limits on size; and such tests and procedures as we may devise to accomplish selective surgery will bring us closer to a state of economizing by Government than by competition.

COUNTERVAILING POWER CANNOT BE MAIN ECONOMIZING FORCE

Recently, another protective force has been identified (or reidentified) and placed on display for our consideration as a substitute for, or supplement to, competition. Kenneth Galbraith has alerted us to "countervailing power," the active restraint on the power of strong sellers or strong buyers provided by the presence in the market of strong buyers or strong sellers—or something else. It is comforting to be reminded that most markets have two sides, either of which may be quite irritating and even frustrating to the other (unless, as has been known to happen, the two sides join hands and gang upon the rest of us); and particularly comforting to be assured that if countervailance doesn't come from the other side of the market it will probably appear from some other quarter—unless something else happens. Countervailing power is a good thing to have hanging over the fireplace; it makes less ominous the threat of monopolistic misconduct. But, it is far too fortuitous in its appearance, too limited and spotty in its scope, too uneven in its drive and too discriminatory in its impact to be relied upon as our principal defense against extortion and, certainly, as the economizing force in our economy.

"CORPORATE CONSCIENCE" IS FOREIGN TO LOGIC OF FREE ENTERPRISE

So, we return again to admonitions to business statesmanship and social responsibility, this time elevated to a way of life. The thesis is that where competition alone is insufficient to maintain the conduct of giant concentrates at par, the deficiency will certainly be supplied (if, indeed, it is not already supplied) by a newly developed and still developing additive—the "corporate conscience." We have already characterized this force as foreign to the logic of free enterprise, and have suggested that to invoke it formally is tacitly to concede that competition is on the wane. The movement to give formal de jure recognition to social responsibility has now attained enough volume and stature, however, to require us to consider it on its substantive merits.

Adolf Berle has presented the case most explicitly: Along with the growth of the big corporation as the repository of great economic power, will come the growth of the corporate conscience. The great modern corporation must be recognized as a political institution upon which, as upon other great political institutions in the past, the flow of events is forcing a degree of public responsibility commensurate with its massive power—"the corporation, almost against its will, has been compelled to assume in appreciable part the role of conscience-carrier of 20th-century American society."

A succinct comment would be: It isn't going to happen; if it did happen it wouldn't work; and if it did work it would still be intolerable to free men. I am willing to dream, perhaps selfishly, of a society of selfless men. Certainly, if those who direct our corporate concentrates are to be free from regulation either by competition or government, I can only hope that they will be conscientious, responsible, and kindly men; and I am prepared to be grateful if this proves to be the case. But, I shall still be uneasy and a little ashamed, with others who are ashamed, to be living my economic life within the limits set by the gracious bounty of the precious few. If we are to have rulers, let them be men of good will; but above all, let us join in choosing our rulers—and in ruling them.

Basically, however, the difficulty with the corporate conscience thesis is that, preoccupied with the problem of economic morality, it overlooks the problem of economizing. It is not enough that economic decisions made by corporate managements shall be good in the sense of being selfless rather than selfish, in the sense that managements derive happiness and serenity of conscience from smiles of gratitude bestowed upon them by persons other than their stockholders. To economize is to choose between competing goods. Economic choices can rarely bring smiles without concomitant tears; and lonely consciences hold no formulas for the optimum distribution of smiles and tears in our economy. Once again, with gestures: Economizing is society's job. Economic decisions must be right as society measures right, rather than good as benevolent individuals construe goodness. An economy is a mechanism designed to pick up and discharge the wishes of society in the management of its resources; it is not an instrument for the rendering of gracious music by kindly disposed improvisers.

IT IS SOCIETY'S ROLE TO ECONOMIZE

The weakness of corporate conscience as the central force in the economy is that it has nothing to do with economizing. Its presence may assure us that the men who make the decisions will be well intentioned and good, but it tells neither them nor us anything about the shape of goodness; it tells no one what society wants done and, hence, what to do. When 170 million men live and make their living together, the fact that every one of them is equipped with a burning 24-hour conscience does not make less necessary the active presence of an overall organizing and directing force to work out the level and trend and allocation of resource use and the division of product. To rely for this on the unguided, uncoordinated consciences of the managements of economic blocs is to abandon order as well as human dignity. Only society is suited and fitted to deal and play these cards. If its standards are nebulous, at least they are its own, and they can be manifested and carried out with some sense of total purpose, in a total pattern which it is society's task alone to design and weave.

Consider the wage, investment, and price decisions to be made by corporate managements, and ask what contributions consciences can make to the solution of the problems they pose. These decisions affect all of society, not just the persons in the immediate family; and not all of those even immediately affected can possibly be made happy by any decisions which can possibly be made. This is quite an assignment to impose on innocent, artless consciences. I am not at all sure that they can stand the strain. Ponder the plight of the management of a giant firm producing a basic commodity, employing thousands of workers at good wages, making splendid profits, and presently facing a crippling strike unless it accedes to a demand for a wage increase. The increase can easily be passed along in higher prices. Workers want higher wages and no interruption in employment; consumers want continued output at an increasing rate, and so do stockholders. The public does not want further inflation, and large numbers of small firms do not want further increases in wages. The White House, which wants high production, full employment, healthy wages, abundant profits and low prices, now admonishes industrial statesmen to recognize their public responsibility and to adopt measures appropriate to the maintenance of equity, full employment, stability and progress. The management—as allocator, distributor, stabilizer, trustee, conservator, prophet, and chaplain, as well as manager—consults its conscience. The diagnosis of the attending psychiatrist will be multiple schizophrenia—the management's personality will not be split, it will be shredded and powdered.

OUR ECONOMIC SYSTEM IS ONE OF CONSTANT CHANGE

We are searching for a force or set of forces which will give us direction as well as protection—which will both guide and guard—which we can accept with self-respect because it is of us and belongs to us, and which will permit us to enjoy the abundance of bigness with confidence. This, of course, is the way economic systems are made: inquiring, searching, experimenting, modifying. None of us will ever know the outcome, because political economies never arrive; they are eternally en route. It is possible, however, to guess at the direction our journey will take, and at some of the scenery and stops along the way. Edward Mason writes of our failure to formulate an apologetic for our 20th century economic system. I suggest that at midcentury our economic arrangements are too nebulous and are changing too rapidly to permit even systematic identification, let alone a defense, and that what we are really lacking is not so much a convincing apologetic as a system about which an apologetic can be constructed in any but the most general terms. I suggest, further, that both a system and its philosophic defense lie ahead on the road we are traveling.

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER IS SEEN AHEAD

My own prediction (and I stress that I am predicting, not prescribing) is that the years ahead will see a great increase in conscious, collective, governmental controls and of governmental enterprise; and that bigness will be a major focal point of the development. The development will reflect a growing, intensified concern over the private possession of economic power so vast that even its possessors are frightened by the implications of their holdings.

CONVICTION GROWS THAT ECONOMIC POWER SHOULD RESIDE IN GOVERNMENT

Our giants firms are sitting like fat, delectable ducks, virtually inviting the Government to open fire with something more effective than antitrust. The invitation will be accepted. One cannot even guess at the occasions which will prompt the firing, or the pattern which the firing will take. It will not be laid down in a single, all-embracing, finely articulated barrage. Its force and timing will almost certainly be affected by the narcotic influence of social responsibility and by fitful spurts of confidence in the efficacy of antitrust produced by sporadic paper victories won by the Department of Justice. But, the conviction that great power over the economy must reside only in a government of the people will be acted on relentlessly, bluntly, and with force. Events will count more heavily than fine logic in determining the action; but events will surely occur, and public action to repossess the power to economize will surely follow.

MEN COULD COME TO ACCEPT DIRECTED COORDINATION

As men ponder these matters they will not fail to be impressed by a panoramic spectacle provided by the giant firm itself—farflung bureaucratic enterprises operating with acceptable efficiency in response to a melange of (only partially identified) motives and incentives, each enterprise held in dubious ownership by thousands upon thousands of persons passively quiet in their shadowy remoteness, and each enterprise apparently quite capable, under responsible direction, of coordination with others in bureaucratic operation on an even wider scale. It could occur to these men that directed coordination, responsible under society's government to society, can be had. It could occur to them that its achievement, far from constituting a threat to cherished freedoms (how free is the individual who is subject to the coercion of compassionless markets or the whims of corporate conscience?) might be a wholly rewarding expression and embodiment of freedom. As the import of these things breaks upon them, it could happen that a faraway expression will steal across their faces. It could be that men will ask themselves, "Why not?"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to yield to the Senator from Montana if I may do so without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. First, I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from South Dakota for his courtesy, and also to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] for his patience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, a few days ago the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced a joint resolution on the problem of civil rights. I do not believe there are many Members of this body who will dispute the need for any of the provisions of that resolution.

Can anyone deny, for example, that there are communities in this country—not in one section alone, but in all sections—in which social tensions among groups of citizens run high? Some may blame these tensions on one cause and some on another, but who can ignore the fact that they exist? The first provision of the resolution introduced by the distinguished majority leader is designed to pit skilled, objective, understanding, and patient men and women against these tensions in an effort to reduce them, in an effort to conciliate those who now look at each other over a gulf filled with hatred, suspicion, and fear. This provision, in short, recognizes that there are sick communities in this country. Having recognized this reality, boldly and honestly, it would bring social doctors into the scene to reason, to heal, and to conciliate.

Can anyone deny, moreover, the need for the second provision of the resolution? That provision would bring Federal authority to bear to curb the malicious interstate movement of explosives. We have had no hesitancy in putting the Federal Government on the trail of those who kidnap. Shall we hesitate now in taking similar action against mad bands of marauders who cross the borders of the States to terrorize and destroy? In the past months we have seen their explosives rip apart schoolhouses and desecrate places of worship. Will we wait until these acts of terror or madness take the lives of children at their desks and men and women at prayer before we act?

Nor can we ignore the need to take whatever measures are essential to bring about equal access to the vote for all the citizens of this Nation. The third provision of the resolution of the distinguished majority leader is designed to move carefully, but nonetheless firmly, in the direction of securing this fundamental right, this right out of which the responsibilities of citizenship flow.

Finally, we cannot overlook the fact that there is a continuing need for the Civil Rights Commission, which was established by law in 1957, to seek positive solutions to the problems of civil rights. The long delay in the executive branch and in the Congress in getting this Commission under way has limited its usefulness to date. It has only begun its work. The fourth point of the Johnson resolution will extend the Commission until January 31, 1961, and give it an opportunity to bring forth useful proposals.

Mr. President, one does not have to agree with every dotting of the "i" or crossing of the "t" to recognize the worth of the Johnson resolution. It represents, in my opinion, a constructive advance in dealing with one of the most complex issues which, having its roots deep in the past, has come to fruition in our day. This generation did not ask for the problem; it inherited it. Nevertheless, we cannot evade it by closing our eyes to it or by pietistic generalizations.

There will be some, I know, who will say we do not need any legislation on civil rights at this time. They are entitled to their opinion. And there will be others who will say that this resolution is not enough. They, too, are entitled to their opinion. In the near future, we shall see how the Senate will deal with these opinions.

Let me say now—particularly to my Democratic colleagues—that this Democratic majority, this impressive Democratic majority was not elected to bask in the sun of political prosperity while the problems of the Nation are shunted behind the clouds. Nor was it elected to pursue the will-o'-the-wisp of the Presidency in 1960 by presuming to do more than it can do in civil rights or in any other matter. It was elected to work, in 1959 and 1960, to work within the realm of the possibilities of the Senate, to meet the needs of the Nation and its citizens. That dictum applies in civil rights no less than in other issues in which millions of citizens have a deep concern.

The Senate can do many things, but there are some which it cannot do. It can share in the making of the laws, but it cannot administer or enforce the law. The Senate can point the way to leadership, but it cannot itself lead.

These are rock-bottom realities of our system of government. We cannot close our eyes to them in questions of civil rights any more than in other great issues. To ignore these realities is to sacrifice the possible for the presumptuous. We presume, Mr. President, if we see ourselves in this question of civil rights as President, Supreme Court, and House of Representatives. If we follow such a principle we shall fail to do what the Senate can do to bring the Nation closer to its professed ideals of equal political rights for all its citizens.

If the leadership of the Senate, particularly the leadership of the majority, has any function at all it is to separate the possible from the presumptuous, and then to see to it that this body works to bring about the possible. The distinguished majority leader is doing that in the issue of civil rights. He has pointed the way in the past in this matter. He is doing it again with the resolution which he introduced a few days ago. I commend him for his prompt and constructive initiative. I commend him for forestalling political pyrotechnics on this issue which, while they provide political capital and bright luster for the few, leave only the ashes of frustrated hopes for the many. I commend him, finally, for his demonstration to the administration of this Government that leadership carries with it the responsibility to do, rather than merely to generalize, to hope, or to evade, whenever a major issue, such as civil rights, confronts the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks several editorials from prominent newspapers.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Jan. 22, 1959]

MAN IN MOTION

There will be plenty of time later on to debate the merits of Senator LYNDON JOHNSON'S moderate 1959 civil rights bill. For the moment it is more interesting to examine this measure for what it reveals of the majority leader himself and what the televised detective shows would call his "M.O."—his method of operation.

With respect to the latter, the introduction of this bill confirms an already well-established fact—that the Senator from Texas is a fast man on his feet. The Eisenhower administration, which certainly is not oblivious to the political implications of a new civil rights bill, has been more or less blocked out of the play. The administration can now follow the Johnson lead or try, with little hope of success, to put across something of its own. Much the same thing applies to the Senate liberals, who would like a much tougher bill. They must be wondering when the next bus leaves.

This bill, and the statement which accompanies it, also provide a certain insight into Senator JOHNSON'S political philosophy. He says quite candidly that he does not even pretend that his measure solves the civil rights problem; that it is only a step toward an ultimate solution. But he adds this:

"We might as well face the fact that the civil rights issue is not going to go away—and it should not go away as long as there are injustices to be corrected.

"We must also face the fact that the issue is not going to be solved by force, because the ultimate goal is human acceptance and that is never secured by force."

This, for want of a better term, is an approach which takes the middle way. It will not satisfy the extremists—either those who oppose any legislation or those who want a legislative club with which to beat down the opposition. But it will appeal, we believe, to a majority of the Senate and also to most of the American people, with whom extreme approaches are seldom popular.

Senator JOHNSON seems to have a special talent for sensing the majority mood and adjusting his legislative goals to it. This has led to a political philosophy, or strategy, which has served him well as majority leader. As much as anything else, we think, it has been responsible for the success which he has enjoyed.

TOWARD CONCILIATION

Mr. Harry S. Ashmore in his "An Epitaph for Dixie" makes the observation that whereas as a boy in South Carolina his experiences were shared by dozens of Negroes, his own daughter growing up in comparable social and economic circumstances knows only one Negro well enough to call by name. The point he is making is that the warm personal relationships that used to exist under the master-servant pattern of southern race relations have disappeared as Negroes have risen to a new and more independent status.

"At the moment," Mr. Ashmore writes, "the South faces the practical problem of creating a new social order to replace a system already eroded to the point where effective communication between the races no longer exists." This same breakdown in communications has been noted by practically every writer on southern race relations in the past 4 years. It is a breakdown made conspicuous by the fact that Negroes no longer look, as they once did, to sympathetic southern whites to lead their campaigns for justice. The colored population has been winning its battles on its own, and in the process severing the informal understanding between the two races.

If the battle for civil rights is to become more than a last-ditch series of legal showdowns, then ways have to be found to get the two sides talking together and negotiating their differences in a rational manner. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON is looking in this constructive direction with his proposal for a Federal conciliation service, comparing the deadlocks in civil rights disputes to some labor conflicts. He will be opposed, of course, by those southern white extremists who will say that they want no integration whatsoever, so there is nothing to talk about. He will also be opposed by those Negro leaders who maintain that a constitutional right leaves no room for compromise.

Yet between the two extremes lies a large body of moderate southern opinion, white and colored, that has been silenced by the uncompromising stand of the present spokesmen for both sides. If the impasse is to be broken, an atmosphere must be created that will encourage the moderates to reestablish communications and discover what each side is seeking. This is not to undercut the importance of firm legal action when legal action is called for. But there is ample room for conciliation as well.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION OF AIRLINE DISPUTES

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, on January 9 I introduced as S. 80 a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act to provide for compulsory arbitration of airline disputes which threaten to substantially interrupt commerce. At that time I carefully documented for the Senate the tremendous cost of civil aviation to the American taxpayer. I also emphasized the stake the general public has in continuous airline operations from a standpoint of business and pleasure, as well as this heavy financial investment therein.

I was interested—and disappointed—in the remarks of Secretary of Labor Mitchell at a meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen in Washington, D.C., on January 13, criticizing the theory of compulsory arbitration for airline strikes. I desire to comment briefly now on Mr. Mitchell's statement, which I ask to have included as a part of my remarks as it is shown by News Release 2676 of the Department of Labor dated January 14, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF LABOR JAMES P. MITCHELL TO THE BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN AND ENGINEMEN SAFETY AWARDS DINNER, WASHINGTON, D.C., JANUARY 13, 1959

The disregard for the recommendations of the President's Factfinding Board in the recent airline strike has caused considerable public worry over the effectiveness of the Railway Labor Act as an instrument for bringing a quick and satisfactory end to such disputes.

Impatient critics have started talking about compulsory arbitration again.

As you know, I have invited men from the industries affected by the act to get together and sit down around a table and consider what changes, if any, may be necessary.

When I announced my intention to do this I said that I was of an open mind as to the opinions introduced and their disposition.

I am still of an open mind.

However, the talk about compulsory arbitration raises some grave questions.

I thought I would take this opportunity, to an audience of railroad labor men who have lived with the Railway Labor Act for many years, and lived with it responsibly, to review the pertinent experiences that other countries have had with compulsory arbitration.

I think it is to our benefit to examine that experience; certainly it should be considered in the present situation.

The first important result of compulsory arbitration, in those places where it has been tried, or is in effect, is the apparently irresistible habit of government to cover a much wider field than was at first intended.

The experience has been that they could no more drop government into the arbitration of a few private matters without government domination of many other private matters than they could drop a stone in a pond without causing ripples.

Workers who claim some injustice, for example, threaten to strike. The government tells them they can't strike. Instead an arbitrator comes in to settle the matter. This places upon government the obligation to bring justice to the workers. By taking decision out of the hands of both the workers and the employers, government takes the responsibility for finding a just solution. What inevitably follows, of course, is that government soon finds itself setting wage scales, fixing the conditions of work, determining hours, hearing grievances, and throwing its dictatorial weight around in other private matters.

This characteristic should be especially significant to a society like ours that prides itself on the free decision of free men and free institutions. We have to consider and preserve the habit of freedom—the habit of concession and agreement, and the impact of compulsory arbitration on that habit.

In some countries the necessary extension of government control—and apparently it is necessary to the system—has led to compulsory unionism, government influence and near domination of both unions and employer organizations, and such strange by-products as the fixing of dictated wage standards on workers in industries not even involved in the original dispute.

Another result that our society should find of interest is what happens to union and employer responsibility.

It is clear to me, as I think it is to most people, that when a third party is making the final decisions, the other two parties whose interests are at stake are going to conduct themselves differently than they would were they making the decisions themselves.

This happens. Labor and management under systems of compulsion have developed a tendency to recklessness. They exaggerate their claims and charges. After all, what have they got to lose?

Compulsory arbitration is little more than the transfer of authority out of private hands and into public hands. But when management delegates to government the right to set pay scales and determine conditions, it gives up what we consider in this country a vital managerial function. For its part, a labor union loses its essential meaning when it delegates to government the right to determine the welfare of its members.

One significant result of compulsion in other countries—and one I think that exposes the extreme practicality with which the whole idea should be considered—is that while it was started to end strikes, it did not end strikes.

What you find in those places is a constant rash of hit-and-run strikes, day-long stoppages, slowdowns, and the like. These are labor's way of protesting what they think are unfair decisions from government. By the time they are dragged into court for striking, they are not on strike. Until the next day, when it starts all over again.

Now, these things happen because human beings are notorious for acting like human beings. They'll do it every time.

There are many other interesting reports from overseas, such as the fact that wages have actually declined under compulsion, the arbitrator's minimum tending to become the standard.

All of them, I think, should be looked at and studied.

Now, I have no idea what the meeting on the Railway Labor Act will produce. I don't know what opinions or ideas are going to be put on the table. Certainly, if compulsory arbitration is discussed, it should be discussed in the light of the experiences I have mentioned tonight.

Nonetheless, thoughtful men in this Nation, and in industries like yours, have an obligation to work toward such decisions fairly and objectively, in full possession of the facts. I, myself, have never feared the habit of freedom, and I do not fear it now.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, first let me say that one of the major objections to compulsory arbitration put forth by the Secretary was that it may cause what he describes "a constant rash of hit-and-run strikes, daylong stoppages, slowdowns and the like." Mr. President, I have never approached any problem with the basic assumption that labor—or any other group of citizens—will not obey the law, and I regret that the Secretary of Labor has seen fit to do so in this instance.

When I introduced my bill I stated that I was well aware of the controversial nature of my proposal, but quite frankly I was surprised to find the Secretary of Labor completely overlooking what, in my opinion, is the most important factor in the whole problem, which is the vital interest of the general public in this controversy. The only mention of the general public in his speech was the understatement of the year to the effect that the recent airline strike caused "considerable public worry."

Travel by commercial airliners has become so necessary to our everyday life that those relying on it should have some assurance that such travel will be available to them, especially since one of the basic reasons why travel by air has become so completely accepted and relied upon is that it is fast, reasonable, and safe, which is due in large measure to the assistance the airline industry has received from the American taxpayer.

As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee which handles appropriations for the civil aviation program, I felt it my duty to remind the Senate, the general public, and the airline industry—both labor and management—of the heavy financial investment of the American taxpayer in this industry. I placed in the RECORD a compilation showing the investment of the Federal Government in civil aviation. This appears on page 259 of the RECORD of January 9. The table shows that in the 10-year period of 1950–59 the Federal Government had spent, or will spend, approximately $2,562,600,000 for civil aviation activities, and I called attention to the fact that the $348,700,000 of Federal money spent for airport construction during that period was matched by added contributions from State and local governments.

I also called attention to the fact that the anticipated Federal costs for the next 4 years of the new 5-year airways modernization program which began in the present fiscal year, plus the operation of all facilities, was in excess of $1½ billion.

I have not developed in detail nor shall I do so at this time, the immense importance of profitable and active commercial airline systems to the defense of our Nation in time of war. However, obviously that point must be strongly considered in this matter because anything that diminishes the prosperity of the airlines, and cuts down their size and their attractiveness to the investing public, is an indirect blow against the security and defense of this country.

Mr. President, I find it difficult to see how these basic facts could have made so little impression upon the Secretary of Labor that he omitted from his statement on this vital subject even the slightest mention of the obligation of the industry—employers and employees—to the general public. Also, he made no mention of the heavy economic loss and inconvenience to the general public and to the communities served by the industry. The purpose of my comments today is to invite again his attention to the factors in the case concerning the general public and to recommend most strongly that he give to the American taxpayer, who is the greatest sufferer in this matter and who has a large financial stake in it, full and fair consideration.

Unfortunately, the Secretary not only forgot about the general public in his approach to the problem, but he has not yet come up with any constructive recommendations in this matter. I hope he will take care of both of these omissions in the near future.

OUR ICBM WEAKNESS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota obtained the floor.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor, so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield for that purpose and with that understanding.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, without losing the floor, the Senator from South Dakota may yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARLSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, it is my intention to comment on the remarks which have been made previously today by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] relative to the defense posture of the United States.

First, I shall comment upon the general observation of the Senator from Wyoming, who alleged that the first Eisenhower defense budget offered a substantial reduction from the last Truman budget. That is true. Mr. Eisenhower was stopping the Korean War, and there was a very good reason why we did not need to spend as much in 1954 as we spent in 1953.

The Senator from Wyoming said, if I remember correctly, that the budget was reduced by more than a billion dollars in funds for the operation of the Army. Naturally, the operational costs, maintenance costs, and the costs of ammunition and other supply items were reduced, because there were not so many men in uniform fighting on another continent. And we were all very happy to have many of them eating at home again, I might add. My second comment on the remarks of the able Senator from Wyoming relates to the origin of the responsibility for the lag in the so-called missile program. I desire to deal with that subject in some detail, but I shall reserve that for the latter part of my remarks.

The responsibility for the lag in the missile program, I may say in passing—the delay of a year and a half—was due to the transfer of $75 million by the Truman Budget Bureau in 1946–47. At that time $75 million for research and development was taken from that category and transferred to Finance Service of the Army. That transfer of $75 million stopped the first Atlas program, a program which was identified at that time as MX774. The stoppage of that research and development program by the transfer of $75 million away from it was responsible for the loss of a year and a half in the development of our missile program.

At that time I was a Member of the House of Representatives, and was a member of the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which dealt with funds for the War Department, embracing the Army and the old Air Corps. I have with me the hearings which were held at that time, and I shall, at the latter part of my remarks, detail how that transfer of $75 million caused a delay of a year and a half in the advancement of the missile program.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or does he prefer that I withhold my questioning until later?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have no objection to yielding now.

Mr. CLARK. Can the Senator from South Dakota tell us when that $75 million was restored to the budget by the Eisenhower Administration for the beginning of the work on the Atlas program?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should prefer to answer that question in sequence, as I take up the whole subject of research and development as it concerns missiles.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be happy to await the Senator's convenience; but I thought that at this point in his remarks he was not, perhaps, giving us the full story on the subject.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, when I have completed my remarks, if the senior Senator from Pennsylvania thinks there is any shortage of facts with regard to the responsibility for that stopping of the Atlas program, I shall be glad to have him question me at that time.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, with regard to the remarks made earlier today by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], at the outset I should like to say that nothing that I shall say will be intended in any way as a personal reflection upon either the ability or the attitude of the Senator from Missouri with respect to the national defense.

During the later years that I was a Member of the House of Representatives, serving on the Appropriations Committee, as I have already stated, the Senator from Missouri made his presentations as the then Secretary of the Air Force. So I knew something of his part in the development of military aviation in our Nation. I also served on the Congressional Joint Committee for Aviation Policy, and I know something of the contribution he made to policy and to program. Nothing that I shall say here will be intended or, I think, could in any way be interpreted as a reflection on his contribution to the development of our Air Force. The matter to which I have previously referred—namely, that with regard to the lag in the missile program—occurred before the Senator from Missouri was the Secretary of the Air Force.

Mr. CLARK. Then I take it that the Senator from South Dakota is not in accord with the criticism of the Senator from Missouri, recently issued by the Republican National Committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I say frankly that I thought that was based upon a lack of information with regard to the whole situation. I did not share that criticism. If the Air Force lost ground in the Truman administration, during the Truman administration, it was not, in my judgment, the fault of the Senator from Missouri. He fought for a 70-group Air Force and I supported him in that. The break in research on a long-range missile took place before he became Secretary, as I shall show later in my remarks.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Later, I intend to ask a few questions of my friend from South Dakota. But at this time I shall only say that his reply to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely typical of his character, and I appreciate it very much.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the Senator's observation.

Mr. President, I think that when I have concluded this review, the responsibility regarding where the lag first occurred will be fixed.

With respect to the general argument presented today by the Senator from Missouri, I wish to make three points, as follows:

First, our relative posture of strength today in the missile field is not to be determined by a comparison in the case of a single missile alone.

Second, our deterrent strength today should not be judged on the basis of whether we may or may not be outnumbered by 4 to 1 or any other ratio in the case of any particular single weapon.

Third, while it might be that we might be able to produce more ICBM's of a certain class than we are producing today, the question ought to be whether we should increase our energies for the particular missile which might be considered operational today, or whether we should spend more of our efforts, our time, our money, and our materials on the development of more refined, more effective ICBM's.

On the first point, let me say that if we are thinking in terms of intercontinental capability, then we must not limit our thinking to a particular single weapon. For example, I was at Vandenberg Airbase, in California, in December, at the time when the first Thor was launched there by a military crew. Previously, the firings of the Thor had been by the scientific teams. But the launching of the Thor when I was present was the first Thor launching by a trained military crew. I made the comment there, on that day, that that should be reassuring to the British, who have agreed to provide a site for the installation of troops to handle Thor missiles. If we are going to measure our intercontinental capability, a Thor base in England has an intercontinental capability even though it is rated as an IRBM, an intermediate range missile. I believe the distinguished Senator from Missouri will agree with me on that point.

Mr. SYMINGTON. May I make a comment on that point, if the distinguished Senator from South Dakota will yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The basic difficulty with the IRBM structure is that the distances from where the possible enemy could launch its attacks on such missile bases are so small that it would not be possible to prevent our bases from being destroyed before our IRBM's could be fired in retaliation. Therefore, as was so ably pointed out in a recent foreign affairs article by Albert Wohlstetter of the Rand Corp., from now on, if we give a possible enemy the advantage of a surprise attack, the IRBM structures abroad will become steadily less important, while the ICBM structures in this country will become more and more important.

I thank the Senator from South Dakota for yielding to me.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the IRBM range is generally thought of in terms of 1,400 to 1,500 miles. A base or a launching site for an IRBM—the intermediate range ballistic missile—at 1,400 or 1,500 miles, if it were within that distance of attractive targets within the Soviet Union, has the same capability as does a 5,000- or 5,500-mile intercontinental missile in the United States. The point of the Senator from Missouri is that by being nearer, it is also more vulnerable as a target for an attempt or an attack by the enemy.

Mr. SYMINGTON. My point is that if the Soviets are within 600 or 700 miles—which they are—of the bases in France, England, Germany, and so forth, then the Soviets could, with their missiles—and we know they have hundreds of medium-range ballistic missiles—destroy any IRBM's located at such points for retaliation purposes, regardless of the range of those IRBM's.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. On the assumption that they would strike first and did not care what happened afterward.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Yes, always on that assumption, because there is no countdown on any IRBM in allied or friendly territory which would be quick enough to prevent the missiles from bases in countries now controlled by the Soviets from destroying those bases before a countdown had been completed.

I thank the Senator from South Dakota for yielding.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to yield, but I should like to pursue my points with a little more continuity.

The deployment of the overseas bases is the thing which, in connection with both the intercontinental bomber and the intermediate range bomber, we have relied upon. Of course, one base alone would be an attractive target, if that were the only base we had overseas. But, in addition to the base in England, it is anticipated that we shall have other IRBM bases—possibly in Turkey or Greece or elsewhere. I have heard at least three other possibilities mentioned.

I recognize that it is not too attractive to other countries to offer themselves as launching sites for IRBM's. But we have this one, and we probably shall have two or three more; and, in addition, we have the great deterrent capability of the overseas bases for the intermediate-range and the long-range bombers—the B–47's, and the B–52's, and any successors to them.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from South Dakota yield for a question?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I shall yield in just a moment.

Under the policy of being on the alert, which the Strategic Air Command organization follows, the introduction of an IRBM base must be coupled with the deterrent capabilities of the overseas bomber bases in making a proper assessment of our intercontinental strength.

Even if the one or two or three IRBM launchers could be knocked out before any one of them could complete a countdown and fire, an intercontinental bomber could take off from a score of bases. An attack on an IRBM base with a nuclear weapon would pull the trigger for devastating retaliation. I hope that never has to be.

Even if one were to concede that the initial attack would always come from an enemy, still the testimony I have heard over a period of years has consistently held that it would be impossible for an enemy to knock out all of our bases simultaneously. Since all of the major bases would have the capability of carrying nuclear retaliation, the deterrent effect remains.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will agree, will he not, that our IRBM, to the extent it is operational, at the moment must be fired from fixed bases, not mobile bases?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Well, I think some of the IRBM's are movable, but not exactly mobile. At least the Army claimed that for Jupiter, its version of an IRBM.

Mr. CLARK. Well, they cannot move off the base at all at the moment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota is not discounting the weakness of a fixed and known position. But I say if we are going to measure our intercontinental capability as against the Russian capability, we should not overlook the heavy and medium jet bombers deployed as they are in bases at home and overseas.

Also, Mr. President, we should take into consideration not merely our progress with Atlas, not merely our progress with Titan, not merely our progress with Thor, but also the intriguing capability of Polaris, the solid-fuel missile which is being developed by the Navy for use with an atomic-powered submarine.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator seriously doubt that the Russians know where every one of our IRBM bases are?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No. The Senator from South Dakota is under no illusion on that point. I think the Russians know where our bases are, and I really think we know where their bases and major targets are.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have seen enough maps and have been at enough secret briefings to be convinced of that—both ways.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator also agree that the Russians have missiles of long enough range and great enough destructive power to knock out any of our overseas bases?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; if they are going to knock out one, but I do not think they can knock them all out at the first strike.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to proceed at this point, and not yield further at this time.

Mr. CLARK. We were right in the middle of the discussion.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. So our relative position of strength as against the Russians in the field of intercontinental ballistic missiles should be measured by our total strength in intercontinental capability, and our developing capability, and not limited to just a single missile.

Though we may be outnumbered with respect to a single missile, if all our capability is added up, we have a very great deterrent strength. There is another aspect of the question—that is our strength when teamed up under a unified command.

General Twining gave testimony on this 2 days ago before the Armed Services Committee. General Twining is not only the head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but also is a graduate, one might say, of the Air Force; and I am sure the Senator from Missouri has great respect for him. General Twining, in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee, 2 days ago said:

> Numbers alone do not reflect the complete picture of capabilities. Twice in the past year, we have had occasion to rely on the capabilities of our own forces, and the mix of these capabilities supporting a firm foreign policy prove to be adequate to deter general war.

I am reading only from the screened portions of his testimony. If I were at liberty to give some of the detail of the facts which were presented under security classification to the committee, I could perhaps be more specific, but I read from the released portion of his testimony. General Twining said:

> I do believe that the United States is prepared to meet the threat it faces today. Our retaliatory forces are fully capable of carrying out their missions and will continue to maintain and improve their capability. The manned bomber will for some time constitute the primary means of delivering strategic weapons in volume and with the degree of accuracy required.

I invite particular attention to this paragraph from General Twining's testimony:

> Our primary nuclear capability rests today in our manned bombers and the same is true of the Soviet Union. The United States outnumbers the U.S.S.R. in intercontinental jet bombers and in medium bombers. Our bombers are manned by the most highly trained and experienced crews in the world. They are ready now.

So while I think it is valuable to explore the positions of strength as of today, I feel we are warranted in saying, with General Twining, that our primary nuclear capability rests today in our manned bombers, and the same is true of the Soviet Union, and I point to his statement that in intercontinental jet bombers and in medium bombers we do outnumber the U.S.S.R.

The next observation I wish to make is that though we might be able to produce more ICBM's of a particular class, the question should still be asked whether that is the best application of our scientific brains, of our productive capability, and of our dollars.

I assume that when the Senator from Missouri was referring to idle plant capacity, he was referring primarily to idle plant capacity for the possible production of more Atlas ICBM's.

Does the Senator from Missouri wish to comment on that?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I thank my able friend from South Dakota. The ICBM capacity in the country today is known to the many thousands of people who work in those plants. Therefore, there is no mystery about it.

In order to have the most current and accurate information for discussing this problem with anyone as thorough and as experienced in this field as is the Senator from South Dakota, I visited last month various plants which are making missiles. Specifically, I went with great care through the plant making the Atlas ICBM. Based on my own shop experience this inspection was very worthwhile.

If more funds were made available to them now, they could produce many more Atlas missiles in the not too distant future. They could do this without increasing the floor space they have available to build the missile at the present time.

Does that answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. That supports the assumption I made that the idle capacity is in the plant which is producing Atlas missiles. The question is, should we buy more Atlas missiles than the presently scheduled production at the Atlas plant, considering the coming of the Titan, the possible coming of the Minuteman, and the possible coming of the Polaris?

Mr. SYMINGTON. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I would not overemphasize that point, because there are plans in operation now to buy quite a few more Atlases and because this is a question of a proven missile against missiles yet unproven and in some cases undeveloped.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am not going to try to recall the figures I have seen on the present rate of production, but the fact is that already, in the very first major installation for the use of the Atlas missiles, we are revising our construction plan for the launching of the Atlas missiles.

The Senator from South Dakota a year ago saw the Atlas in production and saw captive firings on the west coast. He also was at Cape Canaveral, Fla. He was also at Huntsville when the Army developed Jupiter. During the past December, the Senator from South Dakota was at the Western Missile Headquarters near Los Angeles, also at Vandenberg Air Force Base—formerly Cook Air Force Base—where the Thor is launched and which is the first operational and training base for the Atlas, also at Point Mugu, home of the new test range over the Pacific.

I also was at Cheyenne, Wyo., where Fort Warren is being converted for the second operational Atlas base. I know the pads for the launchings for the second squadron have been changed from what they were for the first squadron. There has been a very material change, which could not have been foreseen a year ago. Within the past year it has been found that the launching pads could be arranged to increase the number of missiles which can be launched in a given time.

Following the Atlas comes the Titan, which is being made at Denver. Some people think that missile has more flexibility than the Atlas. How far we should go with Titan I am not sure, in view of the promising indications of Minuteman, which is a solid fuel rocket.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question? I have to leave the Chamber and I should be very grateful if the Senator will yield for one question.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would almost be tempted not to yield to the Senator, if it would persuade him to stay a little longer. However, as a courtesy to my friend from Pennsylvania I will yield to him.

Mr. CLARK. Unfortunately, I am in the midst of some housing hearings which I do not dare abandon any longer.

Would the Senator from South Dakota controvert the statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] that in 1961 our ICBM inventory will be less than 25 percent of the ICBM inventory of the Russians? It seems to me that is a critical point.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I say that in 1961 our intercontinental capability will be much better than the suggested ratio of 1 to 4; I do not limit my estimate of relative position to a single missile. I think the Senator from Missouri was speaking of one class of weapons, the intercontinental ballistic missile.

Mr. CLARK. I think that is the question all of us would be interested in having developed further.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As I have already pointed out, when one considers the capability of Thor for reaching another continent when it is placed at a suitable site, when one considers the schedule for Atlas and the schedule for Titan, and when one considers the rate of progress which we are making with respect to the Polaris missile, I do not think a 1-to-4 ratio is accurate for our intercontinental capability, prospectively, for 1961.

And again, I point out that as of today for both the Soviet and the United States, major intercontinental strength rests with the long-range jet bombers, or those which can be launched on land or sea from advanced positions.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, a minute or so ago my very good friend from South Dakota, whose courtesy in yielding to me I very much appreciate, did not choose to pursue our discussion. The Senator had every right not to pursue the discussion with respect to the IRBM's, when I was about to ask him a final question of whether he would agree that the Russians almost certainly have enough IRBM's of their own pointed at every one of our IRBM bases overseas to knock those bases out if the Russians want to take advantage of a surprise attack.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Does the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I should like to comment on the question, and then I will yield once more to the distinguished Senator from Missouri. After that I should like to proceed a little further on my own.

May I say, with regard to the point raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I think the field for the use of the intermediate range missile is distinctly limited. I do not think we ought to overstock on IRBM's.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for him comment.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I want to be sure the distinguished Senator from South Dakota does not misunderstand what I said in my statement earlier. I realize that the Senator seldom misunderstands anybody.

I have visited the places and have talked with the people who should have full information on the subject. Considering the most conservative estimates of what the Communists probably will have in 1961 our planned ICBM production will be less than one-fourth as much. Inasmuch as these missiles, although they do not come back, are a great deal less expensive than modern bombers, especially when procured on a production basis, it seems extraordinary to me that many more are not being programed. In view of the facts it seems equally extraordinary that the Secretary of Defense yesterday in a press conference should imply that the missile gap is closing. The facts I have been able to obtain as a member of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, as a member of the Military Preparedness Subcommittee, as a member of the Special Committee on Space and Astronautics, and as an ad hoc member of the Defense Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the information I have been able to obtain in my visits to SAC bases, to missile production and testing locations, and to the Pentagon Building, support the conclusion that the planned American ICBM production through 1961 will be less than one-fourth of the estimates of the probable Soviet production through 1961. That is what I think the American people should know. That is what I was trying to present. I wanted to be sure that was the understanding of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. There is no misunderstanding on the part of the Senator from South Dakota with respect to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri. I still want to have everyone understand that I am trying to distinguish between numbers with respect to a single missile and relative strength in intercontinental capability for delivery of nuclear bombs in an all-out war which nobody wants.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Would the Senator please explain that statement?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I mean that when we have a Polaris missile developed with an atomic submarine to carry it, that ought to be counted also in assessing intercontinental strength. I mean that a Thor missile which is operational, which has an overseas base to bring it within range of the Soviet Union, is an intercontinental capability just the same as if we had an Atlas missile stationed in the United States.

Mr. President, I think I have been generous in yielding to my colleagues, and I should like to proceed without interruption for awhile in my answer to the general argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON].

I think perhaps this can be best illustrated by considering a simple little story which comes from Benjamin Franklin. When he was a boy, he tells us, he went to a county fair. It was the first time he had gone to a county fair. He went through the gates, and at the first booth he saw the booth operator was selling whistles. He bought himself a whistle, and he tried it out. The whistle tooted so loud and it was such a nice, fancy whistle—the best that he had ever seen—that he spent all of his money and bought many of those whistles. Then he went on down the road to another booth, where another booth operator was also selling whistles. These were painted whistles, a little more fancy. He tried out one of those whistles at the second booth. It tooted louder than the whistles he had bought, but he could not buy any more whistles, because he was out of cash. He spent too much on the first brand of whistles.

Mr. President, what I am suggesting is that in a field which is changing as rapidly as the missile field is changing, we ought not to stock up, necessarily, on all the ICBM's a particular plant can produce. We ought to apply our scientific ability, our productive capacity, and our cash to getting down the road just as far as we can, rather than to stocking up on hardware that may be obsolescent. We should, of course, buy as many of the Atlas version as we can use in a balanced program but we should take into consideration the fact that as yet and probably for sometime to come the dependable carrier for bombs with a real payload is the big manned jet bomber.

Now, then, I should like to make a few comments with respect to what the Eisenhower administration has been doing in the missile field. These comments bear upon some of the questions which have been raised earlier.

The Senator from Wyoming invited attention to the fact that there was a reduction in the Truman budget when the Eisenhower administration came in. There was a reduction in the defense budget. As has been pointed out, that reduction in 1954 was primarily due to the stopping of the Korean war—it did not come in the missile field.

I have the figures which show the amounts of money which have been spent on missile production and procurement from the year 1951 to the present. I want to present those figures for the information of Senators.

Mr. President, I have this information in separate columns for the Army, for the Navy, and for the Air Force, with a Department of Defense total. Because I shall read merely the totals, with a few illustrations selected with respect to the Air Force, I ask unanimous consent that the complete table may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Expenditures for missiles production and procurement, Department of Defense, fiscal years 1951–58

[Millions of dollars]

Fiscal year	Army	Navy	Air Force	Department of Defense total
1951	-------	5	16	21
1953	119	95	81	295
1954	187	141	176	504
1955	238	176	305	718
1956	333	195	641	1,169
1957	414	264	1,417	2,095
1958	724	345	1,668	2,737
1959 (estimated)	587	417	2,356	3,360

Source: 1951–58, Comptroller, Office of Secretary of Defense, Aug. 15, 1958, from table dated June 16, 1958. The 1959 and 1960 by telephone call to Comptroller's Office, Jan. 23, 1959.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, in 1951 the Department of Defense spent, as a total amount for missile production and procurement, $21 million.

In 1952 the Department of Defense spent $169 million.

In 1953 the Department of Defense spent $295 million.

In 1954 the Department of Defense spent $504 million.

That was the first Eisenhower budget—$504 million for missile production and procurement as opposed to $295 million in the last Truman year. In 1955, the figure was $718 million; in 1956, $1,169 million; in 1957, $2,095 million; in 1958, $2,737 million; the estimate for the current fiscal year, 1959 is $3,360 million. The estimate for 1960, in the budget being presented to the Congress, is $3,922 million, for missile production and procurement.

As the President pointed out in his message the other day, $7 billion is being spent for all missile systems. The figure I have given, of $3,922 million is for production and procurement alone. The $7 billion figure includes research and development, construction of installations, and the Polaris submarines. That $7 billion for missile research and development, production and procurement, amounts to one dollar in eleven out of the total Federal budget proposed for this year.

I do not know what the Senator from Missouri thinks should be the total amount to be spent. If detailed hearings should develop that we can properly spend additional funds for immediate procurement, to increase the stockpile of missiles, without impairing our ability to get better missiles sooner, then the Senator from South Dakota will support additional funds for that purpose but he submits that the budget as presented is in large amounts.

I point out that we are already proposing to spend $7 billion, $1 in $11 out of the total $77 billion Federal budget, and more than $1 in $6 of the $40.8 billion defense budget, for missiles alone, from the stage of research on up to actual procurement.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The $7 billion figure which the President used included so many things in addition to missiles as to be inaccurate. I am very glad that, with his typical candor, the distinguished Senator from South Dakota pointed out that the figure included submarines.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It includes the Polaris submarine.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The Polaris submarine is a submarine.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is a combination of Polaris and the atomic submarine.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I point out to my friend that the cost of a carrier does not include the cost of destroyers in the task force; nor does the cost of Navy attack aircraft include the cost of the carrier.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No. However, as I have already pointed out, Polaris married to the atomic submarine has intercontinental capability.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding to me. I agree with him that one of the most effective weapons we could have is the Polaris submarine. I am very sorry to say that we shall not have any such weapons for some time, and that as I mentioned earlier, we are ordering very few of them at a relatively slow rate. I believe some statement was made about a plane being worth its weight in gold. On the basis of what I believe gold is worth and what the plane costs that statement was not correct. We checked it carefully.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It seems to me I have seen figures for some planes which were worth their weight in gold, and one or two which cost more than their weight in gold, at $35 an ounce. But whatever their cost in terms of gold, some of them are expensive. The B–52 costs about 30 times the B–17, the first heavy bomber of World War II.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The figure representing the cost of the prototype or first plane was used. However, I believe the impression was given that each plane was worth its weight in gold. Incidentally, gold is figured in troy measure, not avoirdupois and the weight of the plane was understated while its cost was greatly overstated.

Based upon the budget before us, the President is requesting less for missile procurement than he did last year. Specifically, the amount is $606 million less in the 1960 budget than in the 1959 budget. It would appear that the administration thinks that, despite what Khrushchev has said about Berlin, the Russian menace is growing less. This is brought out clearly as the President requests a quarter of a billion dollars less in our total defense budget for 1960 than for 1959.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That conclusion does not correspond with the figures I have, which I checked with the Defense Department as late as this noon. The figures for the Air Force, representing actual expenditures for missile production and procurement, for the fiscal year 1958, were $1,668 million. The present estimate for this year, for the Air Force's missile production and procurement program is $2,356 million. That is an increase of about $700 million.

The estimate for 1960, at present before the Congress, is $2,661 million, which is an increase of $300 million over the current year, 1959. That is for the Air Force alone, where the primary responsibility rests in the intercontinental field.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I was not speaking about the Air Force alone, but according to the figures on page 445 of the President's budget the 1959 appropriation for missile procurement was $4,154 million. His budget request for missile procurement for 1960 is $3,548 million or a reduction this year of $606 million. The total appropriation for defense for 1959 was $41,138 million, and the request for 1960, $40,850 million. In other words, there is proposed to be appropriated $228 million less for our overall defense than in the previous year.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Did the Senator say for overall defense, or for missile procurement?

Mr. SYMINGTON. For overall defense.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That includes other fields than the missile field.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Yes. The request for appropriations for 1960 in missile procurement is $606 million less than the figure for 1959.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It is the other way around, according to the figures given me this noon.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The figures I am using will be found on page 445 of the President's budget.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from Missouri said the prospective figure for missile procurement for 1960 would be $600 million less than for the current year. The figures which I was given this noon show an estimated actual expenditure for the current fiscal year 1959 of $3,360 million. The estimate for 1960 is $3,922 million, or, roundly, $600 million more for 1960 than we are spending in 1959. The table will appear in the RECORD.

Now, then, I should like to go back into history a little. I do so only because of what has been said in relation to the responsibility for doing this or doing that, and because of the observations made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] earlier this afternoon.

I hold in my hand the hearings and report on the Military Establishment appropriation bill for 1948. As everyone realizes, the hearings for that year were held in the spring of 1947. At that time Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower was Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army. In his appearance before the House Appropriations Committee on the 19th of February 1947, he said:

> In the field of guided missiles, electronics, and supersonic aircraft, we have no more than scratched the surface of possibilities which we must explore in order to keep abreast of the rest of the world. Neglect to do so could bring our country to ruin and defeat in an appallingly few hours.

That was General Eisenhower speaking in February 1947, 12 years ago. This testimony is at page 78 of the printed hearings.

He went on to say:

> Those of us who were in Europe in the black days when Hitler was making his last desperate gamble with the V–1 and the V–2 know how close to success that gamble came. Yet, those weapons, terrible and effective as they were, were child's toys in comparison with those which can be produced.

A few days later, when General Spaatz, who was Chief of Staff of the Air Corps at that time, appeared before the committee, he also talked about the missile problem. General Spaatz said—page 602:

> It is certain that the weapon of the future which will immediately attack us and which must give us the gravest concern is the long-range bomber or the long-range guided missile. Either of these weapons will follow great circle courses. Trace great circle courses from either of the three areas mentioned above to the industrial centers of the United States and we find that all of these courses pass over or near the Arctic regions.
> We can divine, therefore, that if our defenses are to be between us and the enemy they must be on the Arctic frontier.

On this point he concluded:

> It is for that reason that we have included in our provision of the Air Force units, in our procurement of aircraft, and in our experimental development programs—men, money, and materiel to produce an Air Force with a long-range striking force—a Strategic Air Force.

He spoke of the need for missiles.

Then Mr. Engel, of Michigan, the chairman of the Subcommittee on the War Department, said to General Spaatz—page 608:

I think we all agree on the research and development program. As a matter of fact, I think the President took $75 million of the research money away from you that we gave you last year, asking to have it transferred to the Finance Service of the Army, is that not right?

General SPAATZ. We were reduced $75 million.

Mr. ENGEL. They took about $135 million

General SPAATZ. We were reduced $75 million for research and development that this committee gave you last year.

It was with the money that they had been given under that appropriation in 1946 that they started the MX–74, which was the original Atlas project, with a contract with Convair.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would prefer not to yield until I have completed the sequence of testimony on this matter. When it came my turn to ask questions, General Spaatz was still testifying. General Rawlings, the Comptroller of the Army, was also present. I said—pages 612 to 613:

The chairman has already put his finger on some of the highlights in your statement. I do have a few questions I would like to ask supplementing what he has already asked.

First of all, referring to this $135 million proposed for transfer to "Pay of the Army," or other objects, if that transfer is approved by the Congress, what does it mean as far as your current 1947 program is concerned?

General SPAATZ. That $135 million would take $75 million from research and development definitely. General Rawlings can give you the breakdown.

General RAWLINGS. For research and development $75 million was cut out and in our opinion that has delayed the program probably a year or a year and a half. Do you agree with that, General LeMay?

General LeMay was present, and he said, "Yes, sir."

In other words, General Rawlings and General LeMay at that time, in the presence of General Spaatz, said that the transfer of the $75 million from research and development to Finance Service of the Army was costing us a year to a year and a half in the development of the research program which was devoted to missiles, on behalf of which both General Eisenhower, then the Chief of Staff, and General Spaatz had spoken so earnestly.

Later on Mr. Engel said—page 618:

For the purpose of the record, I do not want any implication in the RECORD, as far as I am concerned, to the effect that General Richards was responsible.

I interpolate at this point to say that General Richards to whom reference was made, was the budget officer of the War Department as a whole.

Mr. Engel continued:

I think you will find that the Bureau of the Budget was the one who made the cut.

Then General Richards said:

The War Department was notified by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that we would have a cut of $100 million in the research and development appropriation.

The Army Air Forces protested to the Bureau of the Budget, and I think to the President; and as a result, it is my understanding that at least one member of the Bureau of the Budget and one member of the Army Air Force went to Wright Field and examined the research and development program. After that the Bureau of the Budget reduced the reduction from $100 million to $75 million.

In other words, after the Air Force protested, the representatives of the Bureau of the Budget consented to go out to Wright Field to take a look at the program. Then, instead of reducing the amount by $100 million, so far as research and development was concerned, as was originally proposed, they took only $75 million from the appropriation. However, that $75 million cost us the year and a half referred to.

Mr. Kerr, a Representative from the State of North Carolina, who was a member of the subcommittee, was very much disturbed by the testimony. When it came his turn to ask questions, he asked about the reduction, as follows—page 627:

What information did the Budget have about the needs of the Air Force of the Army except what you gentlemen gave them?

He was under the impression that this was an arbitrary desk cut made in the Bureau of the Budget, and he wanted to know whether the Bureau of the Budget had any firsthand information. General Spaatz said:

That is primarily the information they have, but in the case of the research and development cut of $75 million the members of the Bureau of the Budget went out to Wright Field where our research and development center is, and went over the program in detail with the personnel there.

Mr. KERR. They cut research and development $75 million?

General SPAATZ. Yes, sir; for this fiscal year—1947.

Our committee was very much disturbed by the fact that $75 million should be taken from research and development, from the missile program, which, they had said, was so important, and that it should be devoted to pay in the Army.

In exploring the matter, it developed, that the reason that representatives of the Air Force were reluctant to say very much about the situation, or bring other reductions to our attention, went back to a letter which had been issued by the White House on November 15, 1946.

That would be the November immediately preceding the hearing.

At page 631 of the hearings, Mr. Engel, chairman of the subcommittee, introduced the letter with these words:

In order that there may be no question as to just what President Truman said in his letter, to which we referred, and knowing that it was sent to every budget officer, I asked General Richards for his copy, and I have it before me, and I want to read it into the RECORD. It reads as follows.

Mr. President, I wish to read the letter because recently there has been some discussion around Washington recently about a simple request by the Bureau of the Budget for members of the executive department to answer questions, but generally to support the budget. This letter I read was dated at the White House November 15, 1946, and is as follows:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE DIRECTOR OF THE BUREAU OF THE BUDGET

I have noticed that on several occasions certain department and agency officials have shown a tendency to seek from Congress larger appropriations than were contemplated in initial budget estimates.

The estimates which I transmit to Congress reflect a balanced program for the executive branch as a whole, and each individual estimate is considered in the light of this program, its relationship to other estimates, and the fiscal position of the Government.

While agency witnesses before congressional committees must feel free to supply facts in answer to questions of committee members, I cannot condone the practice of seizing upon any opportunity which presents itself to indicate an opinion, either directly or indirectly, that my estimates are insufficient.

When you notify the heads of the various departments and agencies of the amounts to be included in the budget for their activities, I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of the Congress.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

That is why the Air Force lost $75 million for research and development, for the continuation of the Atlas development program. It was abandoned and stopped in 1947. It was not until after the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] was Secretary of the Air Force, I believe, that the missile program was resurrected. We did not get much money for it during the last years of the Truman administration, either, as is evidenced by the fact that in 1951 the Air Force got only $16 million for its missile production and procurement program. In 1952, it received $66 million. In 1953, $81 million. However, by 1954, when the Eisenhower administration came into office, the $81 million was more than doubled, the Air Force getting $176 million. In 1955, it was $305 million. In 1956, it was $641 million. In 1957, it was $1,470 million. In 1958, it was $1,668 million. In 1959, it will be $2,350 million. Prospectively, for 1960, it will be $2,661 million.

There is no program that I am familiar with, except perhaps the Manhattan atomic project during the course of a shooting war, which ever received such a rate of advance in the funds appropriated as the missile program has received during the peacetime Eisenhower administration.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. President, I would be the first to agree with the distinguished Senator from South Dakota that some things were done in the past which could have been better handled. I do not think, however, that two wrongs make a right. The ballistic missile program was canceled on July 8, 1947. There was no Air Force at that time; the Air Force was not formed until later.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It was then the Army Air Corps.

Mr. SYMINGTON. It was the Army Air Corps, under the War Department. The Chief of Staff of the Army was Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. I thought at that time that the cancellation of the missile program was a mistake. I advised the people in private business who were making it to continue the study and development on their own. I, however, would not want to criticize anyone in particular for the cancellation of the program.

The Senator stated that General Spaatz spoke to him about guided missiles. We have now a long-range guided intercontinental missile operational, the Snark. We also spent about $700 million, before we canceled the project, for a long-range intercontinental missile called the Navajo. One was subsonic; the other was supersonic. Both were intercontinental, and both were guided.

It is worth noting, however, that the Navajo project started in the 1940's resulted in the development of the rocket engines being used now in the Atlas, the Thor, and the Jupiter.

In 1953 a discovery was made which revolutionized the entire picture with respect to missiles: namely, the hydrogen bomb. Then many persons, including the famous Dr. Teller, developed the discovery to the point where the fusion bomb could be made for a warhead which could be carried by a ballistic missile. Because of the greater advantages of a non-air-breathing missile, provided an effective warhead could be carried, the Navajo guided air-breather missile was finally abandoned, only a year or two ago, after almost three-quarters of a billion dollars had been spent on it.

So, from the standpoint of the state of the art at that time, I cannot blame the Chief of Staff of the Army for the cancellation of the ballistic missile program of the Army Air Corps, which was under his military command.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The record is that neither the Chief of Staff of the Army nor the head of the Army Air Corps agreed to the cancellation. I could produce the testimony in the precise words, if it were important; but I hope, in view of the fact that I have referred to the record so precisely, the Senator will let me give this from my recollection, based upon my knowledge of the record at the time. The testimony of General LeMay on this subject was that that year and a half was gone forever, so that certain foundation work which could have been done had the $75 million not been lost could not be recouped at that time. All that could be done was to go on from that time forward.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In just a minute.

Mr. SYMINGTON. May I continue?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In a minute. I agree that the breakthrough in 1953 was a tremendous factor in the development of missiles. The development of the hydrogen bomb, with certain features of it which particularly lend themselves to uses in missiles, was responsible for a great increase in the amount of funds applied to that purpose. I agree to that.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The Senator from South Dakota also mentioned a transfer from one of the departments of the Army at that time comparable to the Corps of Engineers and the Quartermaster Corps, namely, the Air Corps, of $75 million of Army funds. Obviously, that could have been stopped by the Chief of Staff of the Army. But I do not blame the Chief of Staff of the Army, based on the technical opinions current at that time.

The testimony of Dr. Vannevar Bush before the Special Committee on Atomic Energy of the U.S. Senate on Monday, December 3, 1945, clarifies substantially the confusions as to the distribution of blame in the period prior to the nuclear bomb breakthrough.

I know that my able colleague, before whom I used to present many budgets for the Army Air Corps, and later for the Air Force, will agree that Dr. Bush at that time was considered the outstanding scientist from the standpoint of military matters. In this case, however, not visualizing the hydrogen bomb, he turned out to be a poor prophet when he said:

> We have plenty enough to think about that is very definite and very realistic, enough so that we don't need to step out into some of these borderlines which seem to be, to me, more or less fantastic.
> Let me say this: There has been a great deal said about a 3,000-mile high-angle rocket. In my opinion, such a thing is impossible today and will be impossible for many years.
> The people who have been writing these things that annoy me, have been talking about a 3,000-mile high-angle rocket, shot from one continent to another, carrying an atomic bomb and so directed as to be a precise weapon which would land exactly on a certain target, such as a city.
> I say, technically, I don't think anybody in the world knows how to do such a thing, and I feel confident it will not be done for a very long period of time to come. * * * I think we can leave that out of our thinking. I wish the American public would leave that out of their thinking.

When the most distinguished scientist of his day, the head of the leading scientific organization of the United States, and also for a time the head of the Defense Research Board in the Pentagon, said that, I do not think we can blame anyone, especially the Chief of Staff of the Army, the head of the Army Air Corps, or anyone else, for not being willing to go ahead with the development of ballistic missiles. We were, however, able to overcome the objections of Dr. Bush to the development of long-range, supersonic missiles of the Navajo type.

I want to present this point to my distinguished friend from South Dakota for his consideration: Regardless of whose or how much fault lies in the past, it should have little to do with what we are discussing today, because in 1946, 1947, 1948, and up to September 1949, the United States had a complete monopoly of atomic energy. Today we have no such monopoly. I hope we have learned by our experience of the past, and that we will now prepare for the future and not worry too much about the past. I say this to my able friend from South Dakota, who knows that there is no Member of the Senate for whom I have more respect. He is thorough; he is careful. He is a dedicated, sincere man.

I was not on the floor when the distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] made some statements which I did not hear. But I think the Senator from South Dakota, who over the years has fought energetically for adequate airpower for the United States, will agree that if we will all get together and not waste time trying to assess blame in the past, but rather evaluate carefully what is being done today from the standpoint of the country's weapons, the United States as a whole will be much better off.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I could not agree more with the general philosophy expressed by the Senator from Missouri; but as to the question of where the responsibility rests when the Senator from Wyoming compared the last Truman budget with the first Eisenhower budget, let the record be clear that neither General Eisenhower, as Chief of Staff of the Army, nor General Spaatz, nor General Rawlings, nor General LeMay, nor General Eaker approved of the loss of that $75 million.

They had hanging over them two facts: First, that they had already lost time, because they were told they should not let contracts, since a cutback was in prospect at the time, and they did not dare to contract for the expenditures; second, the President had stated to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget:

> When you notify the heads of the various departments and agencies of the amounts to be included in the budget for their activities, I wish you would include a reminder that I shall expect them and their subordinates to support only the President's estimates in hearings and discussions with Members of the Congress.

So, General Rawlings told us that even if the committee were to restore the availability of the $75 million by special action in February 1947—> we could not economically obligate this money for research and development in the time remaining available in the fiscal year (p. 614).

Also present at the same hearing was Gen. Ira C. Eaker, who was Deputy Chief of the Air Corps at that time. In his discussion, he talked not merely about the guided missiles; he talked about the long-range missile. At page 640 of the hearings he said:

> Ten to fifteen years from now—

That is, from February 1947—

> by working hard, and with at least a quarter of a billion dollars annually for experimentation in that field alone, we can produce a rocket of 5,000-mile range.

That would not seem to be a guided missile—one of 5,000-mile range—that he had in mind unless he was thinking of a robot plane type like the Snark.

I read further from General Eaker's testimony:

> The prototype, or first one, will probably cost $200 million each, and individual rockets of that size and type thereafter may cost as much as $7 million. The cost will come down as the number increases, but it will always be very expensive, since it will be larger and more complicated mechanically than the largest military plane today.

The Germans estimate that the development of their V–2 cost 350 million gold marks, or about $150 million, and required 18,000 man-years of technical activity extending over a period of 6 years. The number of people they had working on this project fluctuated. At one time there were 8,000, but 4,000 technical men as an average worked continuously.

We cannot, therefore, abandon the development of the very long-range, very heavy bomber as a primary weapon of our long-range striking force; but we should, as a wise precaution, spend the necessary experimental funds to insure that we are the first in the field with a long-range guided missile which may be the primary weapon at some future date, but probably not within 15 years.

Mr. President, in conclusion I merely wish to point out that it is valuable to have these examinations of our defense posture, and we need to consider them carefully and soberly.

Certainly we should not spend all of our scientific talent and all of our critical materials and our money on getting the first version of any missile that happens to come along.

Last year, the Congress passed a military reorganization bill. In that bill, we placed upon the Secretary of Defense the responsibility for determining which of competing weapons systems should be selected for actual production when we had passed beyond the stage of research and development.

Consistent with that, the Secretary of Defense is trying to meet that responsibility. Those who have heard him—including Senators on the floor this afternoon—will agree, I am sure, that the Secretary of Defense during his tenure of that office has demonstrated an unusual ability to master a very vast and complicated field; and he is trying to do the best he can with what the Congress provides. And General Twining; as head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, is trying to do the best he can.

I am sure that the debates on the floor and the hearings in the committee will guide us toward the truth and toward our true goal, which is that we shall make the very best use we can of every defense capability.

Certainly we should not concentrate on a weapon which might be out of date by the time we could have ready crews for the deployment or placement of such missiles.

Furthermore, in a day when there is so much tension and so much talk about solving problems posed by military threats, including killer submarines and all the rest, we must never forget that the responsibility of Congress goes further than merely dealing with the mechanics of a defense posture.

When I visit military installations and receive briefings, sometimes I wonder whether the country as a whole realizes the dedication of many of the men who commit their lives to the use of whatever Congress provides for them. Their determination to meet that responsibility is always impressive. I never like to say anthing which would in any way dampen their enthusiasm for the capability of the weapons they have, even though somewhere else I might have heard something which would raise in my mind some doubts about those weapons, because I know that in a war the character and the courage of the men who serve our country will determine to a large extent what they will do with what the Congress provides.

But the responsibility of Congress does not end there. I remember a remark made to me by a colonel in Honolulu, after a briefing there. We were discussing some of the dead ends which we find sometimes in our contemplation of today's problems. He said to me, "You know, Mr. CASE, sometimes I think the answer must be found in some other field."

I offer that also in considering the point which has been raised here today, because I do not believe we shall ever solve the security problems of our country by the mere appropriation of dollars for military weapons.

The security of the Nation rests in part upon our position before the world, upon the national character we have, upon the purity of our intentions, and upon the understanding of the world that we do not have any ambition for an extension of our territory or for imposing our will upon other peoples, but that our one basic purpose is to improve the freedom which all people may have and may enjoy.

So, regardless of the amount of our time and our efforts which we may give to an examination of our military posture, we should equally be concerned with the things which will make for understanding among the people and nations of the world and for lessening the likelihood of war—any war.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; or I shall yield the floor.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, the presentations by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] have been most stimulating. I believe both those Senators have contributed to the information, not only of the Senate, but also of the country, regarding this matter.

What puzzles me is why the Secretary of Defense should, when speaking of the position of the Soviet Union with reference to the manufacture of intercontinental ballistic missiles, say that it may be 300 for 1960 or it may be 200 for 1960, or that the Intelligence estimates of what it is are somewhat overestimated or are somewhat underestimated, as the case may be. It occurs to me that it does not matter very much whether the Soviets have 200 or 300 intercontinental ballistic missiles, for they could practically wipe us off the face of the earth with 100 intercontinental ballistic missils; at least, they could inflict upon our Nation damage which we would not wish to endure. They could wipe out 100 of our major cities, including Washington, D.C., New York, and many others.

So the argument as to whether the Soviets have 300, 200, or 100 such missiles seems to me to be irrelevant in the face of the fact that if they have 100 intercontinental ballistic missiles, or if they have even less than that number, they could do to our country damage which would be unacceptable, and that, therefore, at the very earliest possible time we must move to a position in which we have an indestructible retaliatory power, because it is only such power that will prevent the use by the Soviets of their intercontinental ballistic missiles.

So all of us should get busy, it seems to me, with spending the money of this Nation on the most crucial thing which needs to be done, namely, to redress the military balance and to establish at the earliest possible time an indestructible retaliatory power, whether by means of the Polaris or the Minuteman or any other weapon. In any case, we should get such a weapon; and when we get it, then we can be sure that the number of missiles the Soviets may have will not be important, inasmuch as they will not be used.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. ENGLE. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I wish to congratulate my able colleague, the junior Senator from California, who, although relatively new in the Senate, has for many years been an authority on this subject in the House of Representatives.

I am sure that he shares with me the conviction that the Pentagon should cease operating on the basis of tradition, and should begin to operate on the basis of progress.

We are now putting too much of our wealth into things which we never shall need, in my opinion, if we become involved in a third world war; and we are not building the things we shall need if we are attacked.

The able Senator from California has well pointed out the importance of our capacity to retaliate.

Mr. President, I met with Mr. Mikoyan during his recent visit. After listening to him speak and answer, both his manner and his statements further convinced me that in order to remain free, our country must remain strong.

What all Americans are looking for more than anything else, today, is a just and lasting peace based upon a practicable, workable mutual disarmament program. Such a program must be inspectionproof, in my opinion, particularly because of the record of the Communists in violating agreements.

In addition to the major subject of permanent world peace, we also are talking about another basic objective characteristic which, until recently, I believe, has been considered by everyone to be essential to the functioning of democracy, namely, the people's right to know.

If some Members on the other side of the aisle, like the able and distinguished Senator from South Dakota, would stand up and discuss these matters with us, the American people—who, after all, are the ones who are taxed in order to have a defense that will insure their freedom—would understand a great deal more about the problem at hand. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I do not think anyone would disagree with the general import of the statement made by the very able Senator from California, with whom I had the privilege of serving in the House for many years, and for whom I have a very deep respect. I would only point out, in passing, that an indestructible intercontinental ballistic missile is not to be expected in the first generation; and I just hope we do not stock up and spend all our money on the first version of an intercontinental ballistic missile. Perhaps we ought to buy a few more than we are buying; I think we ought to look into that question very closely, when we get down to facts and figures; but I do not think we ought to run wild on the first version of the first generation of the intercontinental ballistic missile.

Mr. ENGLE. I would certainly agree with the Senator on that statement, but until we get to the indestructible missile——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Until we get to that point, we should take into consideration our other retaliatory capacities, our capability with the long-range bombers and of carrier-based aircraft. If there were an assured superiority on the part of the Soviets today in their position, and if the Soviets had enough ICBM's today so that they could obliterate all our bases, that would be one thing. I doubt that they could, with the distribution and deployment we have. In any event, there must be some feeling today on the part of the Soviets that they could not accept the hazard or the gamble of risking war. They have not done so. I hope before they do, or before, by accident, something happens to precipitate a war, we may have arrived at some way in which the people can get together on the basis of a common understanding.

Mr. ENGLE. We would all like that to happen; but in the meantime—and this is the danger—if the Soviets lead us 10 to 1 on missiles, and we have the only missile which we know about now, namely, the Atlas, and perhaps some of the others, the Soviets may be able, in one swift and surprise blow, to knock out all our SAC bomber bases and missile installations, and have enough missiles left over to potshot us at will.

In other words, the first blow of Russia would be at our retaliatory power, which rests in SAC and the SAC bases, and which rests in military missile sites, such as is being developed at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The Soviets would take out those places first. If Russia has 300 missiles, and we have 30, they can take out the SAC bases of the United States, the SAC bases around the world, and then take out the missile installations. Russia knows where they are. She could simply potshot us at will after that.

That is the kind of thing we cannot permit to happen. That is why I say Polaris is important. The possession of Polaris submarines under the Arctic icecap is, for all practical purposes, an indestructible retaliatory power. It is hard to get at. It would be hard to destroy. Even if the submarines were found, it would be hard to destroy them. That is why the Polaris and the nuclear missile are so important. It is because they are in the field of indestructible retaliatory power, which an enemy could not get at.

The reason why Minuteman is so important is that we can establish 1,000 or 1,500 of them, buried in sites throughout the United States, where it would be competely impossible for the Soviets to knock them out. Russia would not know where they all were. Many sites would be buried in mountains, and Russia could not get at them. As a consequence, at that point the Minuteman, which is a solid-fuel missile, would become, or at least have the elements of, an indestructible retaliatory power.

Those are the reasons why those two means of retaliatory power must be developed. Until we reach that point, we stand in danger of the Soviets having a preponderance of power which would make it possible for them to strike down the retaliatory power of this Nation, to potshot us at will, and then to impose their will on this country.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ENGLE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. The Senator from South Dakota has expressed the view that the possible development of the Minuteman is one of the reasons why the Atlas should not be built in greater quantities. I believe it is pertinent to point out that Congress appropriated $90 million last spring for the Minuteman, not one cent of which was spent by the Department of Defense, and, at least until recently, not one cent of which was planned to be spent in this fiscal year.

One of the easiest ways to cut expenses in the military is to talk about things in the future and postpone spending on what is available and needed at the time. That is an old trick, and I have watched it used in both administrations. But, it involves unnecessary and dangerously heavy risks, as it leaves us exposed to possible successful attack in the interim.

Another thing that worries me is that some people believe that when one favors a stronger defense he is calling for the expenditure of a great deal more money. That is not necessarily true. If we would stop wasting money on devices and weapons which we do not need, we would have an excellent possibility of spending money more effectively on what we do need. For example, for some years now, many of us—I do not know the position of the Senator from South Dakota on the matter—have been "cool" to "cold" with respect to the modern antiaircraft device which is now called Nike.

I think all those interested in the security of the United States and its defenses believe that should there be another war—which God forbid—it would start with a surprise strike against our capacity to retaliate, as has been pointed out so well by the Senator from California. Why, therefore, have we spent billions of dollars in placing Nikes around our cities, while the bases which would take the first attack are relatively poorly defended.

That is the type and character of actions from the Pentagon which are very hard for me to understand.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I believe the distinguished Senator from California has the floor, but, of course, I would be glad to hear further from the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was going to say if there is any doubt about how the Senator from South Dakota feels about some of the Nike expenditures, I suggest he consult General Twining and some of the things I brought to his attention, no longer than 2 days ago, or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations, for he would assure the Senator from Missouri that my position has been one of questioning on many Nike expenditures.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS IN THE PRESENT SENATE CHAMBER

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the observance of historic and other significant anniversaries seems to occupy an important and unique place in our American way of life. Each year organizations the country over devote time and energy to promote celebrations commemorating events of special interest to the groups and areas most concerned. We in the Congress have frequently signified our interest in programs of a commemorative nature by establishing commissions to organize or coordinate activities directing the Nation's attention to great events which have contributed to our national heritage.

Few stones are left unturned by the vigilance which anticipates and creates interest in commemorative occasions. It is rare indeed when one of these occasions slips by without so much as a passing notice. Yet we, as Members of the Senate, are guilty of overlooking an opportunity to indulge in a little private commemorating of our own. In order that we might retrieve some measure of this golden opportunity which so far has escaped us, I am pleased to invite attention to the fact that 100 years ago, on January 4, 1859, the Senate first moved into this Chamber.

The procession which marched over from the old Senate Chamber a century ago was led by the State of Kentucky, which was as it should have been, since the Senate's presiding officer was Vice President John Cabell Breckinridge, distinguished son of Kentucky, who was the youngest man ever elected to that eminent post. Born near Lexington, Ky., he was only 35 years old when elected in 1856 as a running mate with James Buchanan. Kentucky born and largely Kentucky educated, he served with distinction with the Third Kentucky Volunteers during the Mexican War, and was elected to the House of Representatives for the 32d and 33d Congresses.

Unsuccessful as a presidential candidate against Abraham Lincoln in 1860, he was elected to the Senate to serve until expelled by the resolution of December 4, 1861. He rose to the rank of major general in the Confederate Army during the Civil War, and was Secretary of War in the Cabinet of the Confederate States from January to April 1865. Following the war, he was in Europe for more than a year, later returning to practice law in Lexington, where he died in 1875.

Mr. President, the bust of former Vice President Breckinridge is in the northeast corner of the Senate gallery. On inspection, however, one will find that the name engraved on the pedestal supporting the bust has been misspelled. I am going to invite the attention of the Committee on Rules and Administration to this matter, to see if we can obtain funds from somewhere to appropriately spell the name and the State of that great Kentucky family.

I should also like to mention the names of the two Kentucky Senators who participated in that great occasion a century ago, John J. Crittenden and John B. Thompson. Senator Crittenden, born near Versailles in Woodford County, Ky., served in the Senate on four different occasions; twice was Attorney General of the United States; was nominated, but not confirmed, as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court; served as Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky; and was standing for reelection to the House of Representatives when he died in 1863.

Senator Thompson, a native of Mercer County, Ky., served several terms in the House and was Lieutenant Governor of Kentucky prior to his Senate service from 1853 to 1859.

It was appropriate several years ago, when this Chamber was extensively renovated, that removal of the old desk, first used by Vice President Breckinridge, was followed with its presentation to Vice President Alben Barkley, another esteemed son of Kentucky and last user of the desk. The old Clerk's desk, removed at the same time, later was presented to the Commonwealth of Kentucky for display in the senate chamber of the old Capitol Building in Frankfort. Kentucky also memorialized the names of Breckinridge and Crittenden by naming 2 of her 120 counties in their honor.

Actually, Breckinridge County was named for the grandfather of the former Vice President, and the first Kentuckian from that distinguished family.

As we look upon the splendor of our Chamber today, it is difficult to realize that, except for 3 occasions, the Senate has convened here for 100 years. The Senate of the United States is often referred to as "the greatest forum in the world," and one need not ponder long within these walls to revere the greatness which is our heritage in the Senate and which has shaped our Nation into eminence as the world's strongest and most vigorous citadel of freedom.

THE MISSILE RACE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, this afternoon we listened to a very interesting and worthwhile discussion on the subject of missiles. We all know, of course, that the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON], a former Secretary of the Air Force, is one of our foremost experts in the field of defense. He knows whereof he speaks.

Another individual who has made a deep study of this particular subject is the distinguished junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON]. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks two articles, the first of which is entitled "Grim Warning in the Missile Race," written by Courtney Sheldon and published in the Christian Science Monitor of January 16, 1959; the second being an article entitled "Military Gadfly," written by Thomas O'Neill, and published in the Baltimore Sun of January 21, 1959.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 16, 1959]

GRIM WARNING IN THE MISSILE RACE—A CAPITAL INTERVIEW

WASHINGTON.—Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, Democrat, of Washington, frequently in the forefront when Congress debates questions of national security—is convinced that:

"Just dealing with missiles that they (the Soviets) have against missiles we have in the intercontinental range, they certainly must have a good 2-year lead.

"The administration made a serious mistake in freezing funds that we (in Congress) added during the past year to the Minuteman missile (intercontinental ballistic) system.

"I foresee more dramatic events that will bring home to the American people that maybe things are not what they should be here."

This is how the youthful and diligent Washington Senator expressed himself in an interview with this correspondent:

Long before the sputniks went up, Senator, you were warning that the United States lagged in defense preparation. What is on the top of your list now among steps the Government should take either in defense preparations or in space exploration?

"Well, I think there is a need to do two basic things. The first is to step up our space and missile program. Second, we need to improve our ability to fight what is probably the greatest danger, a limited war.

"But I should like to emphasize what I think is the most important thing of all, and that is that the Soviets are coming out first with weapons systems that are double edged. Their military capability is clear but what many are missing, and this administration is missing, is the enormous psychological effect that it is having in the cold war. It is hurting us."

What would you estimate to be the gap during which the Soviets would be critically stronger in military preparations?

"This is a very difficult estimate to make.

"When we try to evaluate this, we should take into consideration operational capability—and I think the estimate that has been indicated in the press of some 300 Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles to maybe around 100 of ours in the early 1960's may be quite accurate. If we continue at the present pace and do not accelerate our program—just dealing with missiles that they have against missiles we have in the intercontinental range—they certainly must have a good 2-year lead. This does not mean to say that we cannot overcome it. I think we can."

What is the capability of the Soviets to launch an intercontinental ballistic missile attack with some hope of success in the immediate future?

"I don't think they could launch a very well coordinated attack prior to 1961. They have enormous capability against Western Europe. If they move against Western Europe first, this would alert the United States because of the time factor. They have, I think, a large number of operational ballistic missiles, but I would guess it would be 1961, in that period, before they would have sufficient numbers to engage in such an adventure."

What is your estimate on how much more the Government should spend annually on defense?

"I want to preface my answer to that question by making this observation. I do believe that we could save money in the area of defensive missiles—surface-to-air and air-to-air missiles. I think that we are developing too many systems and we are wasting money. I refer to the fact that a Nike and Hawk have such limited range and require so many different sites. I might point out that they require sites that are entirely new, whereas the Bomarc system which can utilize existing airbases does not have that requirement."

Can one honestly say that an elaborate system of air defense deters the Soviets today?

"I don't think so. I think that the deterrent is our ability to retaliate without delay."

Were you referring to the Nike-Zeus, too? (a missile being developed for use against missiles rather than planes).

"Yes, I think the defense against intercontinental ballistic missiles is far more difficult than the role played by Ajax and Nike Hercules. They are dealing with manned bombers. We must assume that the Soviets have what we call a standoff bomb of at least 100 miles so they completely outflank that system."

What specific programs do you feel need more funding?

"Minuteman, which leads us to what I might call the invulnerable deterrent. The administration, I think, made a serious mistake in freezing funds that we (in Congress) added during the past year to the Minuteman missile system. This is, of course, the solid propellant missile which can do two things. One, it can be located almost in the bowels of the earth. Secondly, it is susceptible to mobile application. It can be placed on railroad cars. It can be hidden away in tunnels. It can be moved in many directions, so the Soviets would have great difficulty in locating those targets.

The sooner that we get to the invulnerable deterrent, the mobile Minuteman on the ground and Polaris which is the mobile missile system under the water, the sooner we will have reached a point where we can see ourselves cutting back in defense costs. I don't know of any means by which they could destroy this system without engaging in just an almost impossible undertaking."

It is reported that the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff are going to go along with the President on his defense budget. Is this your information, too?

"Oh, I'm sure that is true. They'll go along as good soldiers, but obviously that is not their best professional judgment as distinguished from a purely political decision. And I think they will be intellectually honest about it."

Assuming you aren't as successful as you hope to be in that respect are there any other sources of ammunition which you can draw from to make your arguments stick?

"I think the only means that we have are public exposure through hearings. Unfortunately there are limitations in that area because of security problems. The next area that will be helpful will be the Soviet Union. I foresee more dramatic events that will bring home to the American people that maybe things are not what they should be here. The Soviets are going to do a number of things in the next few months to further bolster their posture in the cold war which, obviously, they are winning."

Would you care to hazard a guess as to what some of these might be?

"I think that there are two or three definite possibilities. First, of course, placing a man in space. This will be an enormous achievement. Second, either orbiting the moon, or hitting the moon, locating some scientific gadgets on the moon, and eventually landing some human beings on the moon.

And then maybe to remind people on earth what they are doing I think one can expect a large dramatic type of satellite that will further exploit the communications aspect of orbiting the earth. I think something in the area of meteorology could well be one of their plans. Some of these things can occur in the next few months."

[From the Baltimore Sun, Jan. 21, 1959]

MILITARY GADFLY

(By Thomas O'Neill)

WASHINGTON.—President Eisenhower's severest congressional critic in the realm of military budgeting is an Army ex-private, Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, a lawyer, from Everett, Wash. Although these credentials are less formidable than, for example, those of a former Secretary of the Air Force such as Senator STUART SYMINGTON, the earnest and emphatic lawmaker from the Pacific Northwest engages the respectful attention of his colleagues in this field, in part because he was a presputnik sounder of alarms about the pace of American missile development. His present insistence that the level of defense spending recommended by Mr. Eisenhower is a couple of billions shy of meeting the lead points to trouble for the administration in its struggle to hold governmental outlays within the limits of prospective income.

At 46, Senator JACKSON has spent only a few years less than half his life in Congress. After a dozen years in the House, he moved to the Senate in the 1952 elections, and is now in his second term in that Chamber. His standing as a Senate insider is reflected in his membership on three front-rank committees—Armed Services, Atomic Energy, and Government Operations—as well as the Interior Committee.

As a candidate for reelection to the Senate last year, Senator JACKSON had to go through a primary in which the campaign of his Democratic opponent rested solely on the indictment of excessive militarism, stemming from the Jackson agitation for greater defense expenditures. Senator JACKSON won renomination in a walkover. The candidate originally picked by the Republican State Committee to oppose him in the general election backed away from the contest, pleading that more money than was available would be needed. Against a replacement described by the Republican leadership as just about the best candidate we could have, Senator JACKSON rolled up the biggest majority ever given a Senate candidate in his State. A testimonial to his political potency appeared in a headquarters letter to GOP workers during the campaign admonishing that—

"We must keep JACKSON occupied so that he won't be able to spend his time and influence helping other Democratic candidates."

Now regarded as unbeatable, and with his hand strengthened by the election outcome, Senator JACKSON returned to Washington to press for action to overcome a Soviet advantage in the production of intercontinental missiles which he is convinced represents at least 2 full years and to argue that any program less than wiping out that gap would be reckless. His assumption is that the Soviet advantage is in the order of 3 to 1, and he believes that American progress has been delayed by spreading this country's efforts over too many different weapons systems, with a consequent waste of money.

Condensed, his principal recommendations are: (1) the accelerated production of the Minuteman, the mobile solid propellant missile for which Congress added funds in the last budget; (2) extensive deployment of the underwater missile, the Polaris, in the submarine fleets of this and allied nations as an unseen deterrent to Russian attack; (3) better capability to fight a limited war, which he says may be the most probable result of international tension if the nation is preoccupied with deterrents to a big war.

Out of experience as chairman of a special NATO committee on scientific and technical manpower, Senator JACKSON has gathered that America's European allies would be less restive except for the presence on their soil of missile bases within range of Russian intermediate weapons. His prescription for this problem is the transfer of the missiles from land to sea aboard submarines. He observes that the British are uneasy about missile bases in their countryside and the effect if Russia should start firing at them from within its own territory. He recommends, and has for several years, that submarines roving about the seas with missiles tipped with H-bombs would remove that cause for concern, and would pose a constant threat to Russia without themselves affording a target for land based missiles.

Senator JACKSON (known universally by a boyhood nickname, "Scoop," acquired when he had a newspaper route) seems certain to be in the middle of things during this session of Congress. The politically minded, observing the Democratic attachment to the Far West represented by the decision to hold the next national convention in Los Angeles, speculate that by 1960 the party may be looking for a far western figure to fill out the presidential ticket—and there is "SCOOP" JACKSON, right at hand.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, both of these articles go into some detail relative to the efforts on the part of the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], and his activities in the field of missiles. The junior Senator from Washington points out, in dealing with missiles, that, as against the missiles we have in the intercontinental range, the Soviets most certainly have a good 2-year lead. He is convinced that the administration made a serious mistake in freezing funds which the Congress added last year for the Minuteman, an intercontinental ballistics missile.

He foresees events which will bring home to the American people the fact that perhaps things are not what they should be. This diligent Senator, this military "gadfly," has, of course, been sounding the tocsin for a number of years relative to our position in the field of missile development.

He is to be commended for the many contributions he has made. In my opinion, he is a figure of great significance in the Democratic Party. I should like to read for the benefit of the Senate the last paragraph in Mr. O'Neill's article:

Senator JACKSON (known universally by a boyhood nickname, "Scoop," acquired when he had a newspaper route) seems certain to be in the middle of things during this session of Congress. The politically minded, observing the Democratic attachment to the Far West represented by the decision to hold the next national convention in Los Angeles, speculate that by 1960 the party may be looking for a far western figure to fill out the Presidential ticket—and there is SCOOP JACKSON, right at hand.

I realize that this is too early to deal definitively in the field of politics in the presidential sense, but I believe that one of the outstanding prospects of our party in the field of vice presidential nominees is the distinguished Senator from Washington, HENRY JACKSON. I know that in the next 2 years much will be heard of this man, although he still has a long distance to go on the route he has chosen for himself.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and at 3 o'clock and 33 minutes p.m., the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, to Tuesday, January 27, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 23, 1959:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSIONER

Charles A. Webb, of Virginia, to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner for a term of 7 years expiring December 31, 1965—reappointment.

IN THE COAST GUARD

The following-named persons to be captains in the U.S. Coast Guard:

Claude H. Broach	Wallace L. Hancock, Jr.
Evor S. Kerr, Jr.	Adrian F. Werner
Walter S. Bakutis	Woodrow W. Vennel
Edgar V. Carlson	Gilbert F. Schumacher
Loren E. Brunner	Charles Tighe
Charles E. Columbus	Richard Baxter
William L. Sutter	Oscar D. Weed
Gilbert R. Evans

The following-named persons to be commanders in the U.S. Coast Guard:

Roland H. Estey, Jr.	Harold T. Hendrickson
Arthur L. Roberts	Robert J. Clark
Louis L. Lague	Clinton E. McAuliffe
Freeman H. Harmon	David W. Woods
James C. Waters	Hugh F. Lusk

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Challenge of Metropolitan Growth

OF
HON. VANCE HARTKE
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 23, 1959

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, on January 16, 1959, the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] delivered a most interesting and educational address before the Citizens Conference on Metropolitan Area Problems, which was held at American University.

In order that Senators may have an opportunity to read the address and benefit from the experienced analysis of our great chairman of the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ALAN BIBLE, CHAIRMAN, JOINT COMMITTEE ON WASHINGTON METROPOLITAN PROBLEMS, TO THE CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON METROPOLITAN AREA PROBLEMS, AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, JANUARY 16, 1959

Commissioner McLaughlin, President Anderson, and ladies and gentlemen of the Citizens Conference on Washington Area Metropolitan Problems, you are meeting today to consider not only the problems of the National Capital region, but problems typical of our modern America, where some 60 percent of the people live in the 168 standard metropolitan areas. Of this metropolitan population, more than half live in 14 of the 168 areas. Washington is one of them. Of our city dwellers, nearly 9 out of every 10 live in a metropolitan area. The outlook for the future growth of our burgeoning population is for further concentration in a handful of large cities. If we expect in the year 1975 a total population of about 220 million persons, urban areas will have to face the absorption of 50 million more people.

When we speak of metropolitan areas we are talking about large aggregations of population living in politically fragmented areas. The metropolitan trend is a suburban trend. Over the last 10 years, at the rate of 4,000 people a day, our population has moved into the suburbs. That is where 14 million of them have moved since 1948. And again there is no expectation that this trend will slacken.

But it is not with these facts of growth alone but the problems that they imply that conferences like this are concerned. What are some of these problems? The pressure of increasing urban populations against limited natural resources, such as water, is certainly one of them. In my dry section of the country it is probably the principal problem. But even here in the humid East we are concerned with it. The problem of metropolitan mobility is another one. By 1975 there may be 88 million passenger cars and a two- and a three-car family will be commonplace. The shortage of school buildings is evident to everyone who lives in suburban communities. The increase of our school population by approximately one-third or 13 million pupils is expected in all our elementary school population by 1975 and a high school enrollment of 5 million is also contemplated.

These are some of the things that our increasing population will demand if the American standard of living is not to be lowered and if the prospect of metropolitan growth is not to be stifled.

I repeat that these are national problems when looked at in their true perspective. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON has recently called attention to the need to know more about this vital sector of American life. He has recommended the creation of a broad study commission to survey these emerging problems and how they are affecting our great metropolitan centers. The widespread congressional interest in these matters may be further described. In the last session not less than four bills proposing the creation of a Federal Department of Urban Affairs, or, as one Representative phrased it, of "urbiculture," were introduced in the House. Earlier this week Representative OSTERTAG introduced in the House the first of what may be a series of proposals for a study of national metropolitan problems. Senators KENNEDY and CLARK have already voiced their concern with these problems and the need to do something about them in the present session of Congress. Even the President has recognized this need in his message earlier this week.

I think that we can take it, without further demonstration, that the subject of this conference is not only one of national importance but one of congressional concern.

What you are going to discuss here today and tomorrow may seem, to many, a local problem. But I would like to begin by setting it in a broad frame and by reminding you that what is done in Washington will have a far-reaching significance in other metropolitan areas throughout the Nation.

The position of our city as a prototype of the ideal American city, as a pilot plant of metropolitan area government, has frequently been urged upon us, and with good reason. The government of the District of Columbia is a national problem, made such by the Constitution of the United States which confers upon Congress the exclusive legislative jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever for the government of the District of Columbia. It is the inseparable relationship between the government of the District of Columbia and its rapidly growing surrounding area that gives rise to the concern of the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems. In the studies of the last year much has been learned of this relationship.

We know, for example, well over half of the area's population is now located outside the boundaries of the District of Columbia. What is more surprising, one-third of the Federal employees in the area are working in establishments located in the environs rather than in the Capital City itself. The Federal Government has tremendously increased its land holdings in the metropolitan region and is today by far the largest single economic factor in all four metropolitan counties. While the entire metropolitan area constitutes one market, of course, I think it is with some interest, in illustrating the dispersal of Federal employees throughout the area, to note that of the Federal payrolls in the fiscal year 1958 which totaled $1,350 million, nearly 30 percent was paid to those employed in adjacent counties of Maryland and Virginia.

Let me return to the hope that has been voiced over many years that the Federal Government exercise its unique responsibilities in the National Capital region to create an ideal metropolitan area. This has been forcefully stated by Prof. Daniel Grant of Vanderbilt University in the following terms, "If the Federal Government could achieve an effective integration of the government of the District of Columbia with its suburbs by some method also available to other metropolitan areas, the result would be new hope for metropolitan integration the country over." Another scholar, Victor Jones, has urged, "The least that the Federal Government should do is to study the problems of its own metropolitan area. Here Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the central city. The Federal Government has an opportunity and I believe a responsibility to act as a model to the rest of the country by recognizing that the National Capital is a metropolitan community spilling over into several counties and independent cities of two States. It also has an opportunity to develop a model approach to a comprehensive and cooperative study of the problems and to the development of solutions."

My purpose in marshaling these facts and citing these quotations is to inspire and encourage your efforts at this conference by reminding you of its broader significance. Let me now turn to another aspect of this subject which I believe you will also find invigorating.

Washington has an enviable record in recognizing and dealing with the problems of metropolitan growth and expansion, and Congress has been prompt in recognizing the appearance of these problems and supporting enlightened measures for dealing with them. This record over nearly a century is one reason why the creation of the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems was a logical and altogether consistent step for Congress to take, and why I believe that the recommendations of the committee in its final report (which will be handed Congress the end of this month) should receive favorable consideration.

Let me review this record. Over a century ago, Congress acted to protect the metropolitan area water supply by creating the Washington Aqueduct, one of the first large-scale regional water supply undertakings in the United States. They planned on such a large scale that with minor repairs and alterations this system has lasted until the present day, when it provides treated Potomac water not only for the District of Columbia and the whole of Arlington County, but for other local and intermittent needs as well. In 1902 the Senate Park Commission, headed by Senator McMillan, of Michigan, drew together a team of outstanding national figures who produced the great McMillan report which retrieved the original conception of the Capital City left by our Founding Fathers from its 19th century obscurity and laid the foundations for the Capital City that we know today. The National Capital Planning Commission and the Fine Arts Commission, to say nothing of innumerable parks, monuments, and building projects all derive from the McMillan Commission report. This is well known. But it is not so well recognized that the scope of the Commission's work was not limited to the National Capital but extended up the Potomac River to Great Falls and down the Potomac to embrace that great historic shrine, Mount Vernon.

Large portions of the metropolitan area also acted independently to deal with the problems of metropolitan growth in an orderly fashion. This was conspicuously true in 1918 when the Maryland Legislature established the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, and a few years later the Maryland-National Capital Park and Planning Commission. For the Maryland portion of the suburban area these two agencies have rendered invaluable service. Today it is apparent that they have not only helped plan the orderly development of the Maryland suburbs but by the provision of waterlines and sanitary sewers have tended to structure the development of these areas in such a way that they are inherently more economical to provide with local government services than would otherwise have been the case, and is tragically the case in so many suburban areas in American cities. A good beginning in the same direction has also been made in Virginia through the establishment of the Northern Virginia Regional Planning Commission, which this year is being greatly strengthened. Our committee has contemplated the proposed establishment of a Northern Virginia Sanitation Authority as a natural and beneficial step.

In 1952 Washington became the second metropolitan area in the United States to establish an official regional planning agency. In 1955 Congress authorized the creation of a metropolitan area mass transportation survey which, in method and in boldness of conception, has already set the pace for similar studies in other areas.

The organization of the Washington Metropolitan Conference, under the leadership of Commissioner McLaughlin, 2 years ago, was a major step forward in developing a political organization that reflects the interests of local governments throughout the area. It has other characteristics which are unique and valuable. These include the membership in the conference of the State legislative delegations in Maryland and Virginia. (I was interested to read in last week's New York Times a proposal to strengthen the only other comparable metropolitan body in the United States, the New York Metropolitan Conference, in a report prepared by Prof. Wallace Sayre of Columbia University. His recommendations impress me as mild, indeed, compared with the role for the conference proposed by our committee's own staff consultants.)

May I claim, too, the establishment and activities of our own Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems as another milestone in metropolitan area progress. There have been, of course, other studies of a broadly similar nature in other American cities. But, I know of none that compares to what we have undertaken—in its unique combination of broad scope and the consideration of metropolitan areawide problems and solutions in an institutional sense, and considerable depth in the analysis of the specific problems selected by the committee for detailed study.

Earlier I have referred to the final report of our committee which will be given Congress the end of this month. The committee also proposes to continue its work through the summer in order to receive the report of the mass transportation survey and hold such hearings on it as may be necessary. When that remaining task has been completed, our work is done. But, however useful, the report of a temporary committee is far from all that is needed if our enduring metropolitan problems are to yield to continuous attack. We need, both in Congress and in this community, organizations that will bring continuity to our efforts to deal with area problems. In this very real sense, it is up to you, the people who have demonstrated their interest in working on these continuing problems by your attendance here. The many legislative acts and administrative decisions required by regional problems will gain unity if there is a regionwide and fully representative citizens organization at work in this field. At the least, let me voice the hope there will be further regional conferences of this sort.

This record of metropolitan progress, taken as a whole, is one, I claim, that any American metropolitan area would take pride in, and sets a high mark for our present and future efforts. In particular, it allows me to hope that we have already made substantial progress toward the goal of that municipal ideal and national example that we have been urged to create.

Now from these heights where, in the role assigned me as keynoter of your conference, I have tried to look ahead and behind and to either side, to provide a framework for your deliberations, and to inspire your efforts, let me descend briefly to the level where you will find yourself working in the next 2 days. I would like to say a word or two about the political problems of the National Capital region. Many of the things people want to accomplish cannot be achieved through existing local governments. Many of the things that metropolitan growth and expansion require, if indeed growth is not to be frustrated altogether, are beyond the capacity of the existing instrumentalities of government. We must choose whether to take the necessary forward step and create new institutions of government that can deal with problems on a regional scale, or to submit to the consequences of inaction. These consequences are formidable but the difficulty of moving ahead seems to me to have been exaggerated in most of the solutions that have been offered.

I can concur with those who believe that a general purpose regional authority is too remote from the people to be a realistic solution to what is, in the end, a problem of local government. I also share the fears of those who object to the proliferation of a number of separate functional authorities and special districts, lacking relationship to each other or to the established local governments of cities and counties in the region.

The opportunity which is open—in theory, at least—in most American cities, of annexing the adjacent suburban development or of consolidating cities and counties, appears to me be barred by the provisions of our written Constitution. The course of retrocession, ardently urged by Professor Franchino of the Georgetown University Law School, on the precedent of the retrocession of Arlington County to Virginia in 1846, also seems to me politically unlikely, to say the least.

I suspect that in this area we will have to find some new means of organizing to undertake the unique tasks of metropolitan government. I suggest that the eventual solution should be one in which local interests can find effective representation, giving them not only a voice, but some control. I am sure that, given the unique congressional responsibility for our central city in the District of Columbia, and the great and growing Federal interest in the surrounding area, the desirable structure of regional government must be one in which the Federal interest will be effectively represented.

Perhaps this does not sound like the tidy administrative conceptions that have been offered in some metropolitan areas of the United States, and chiefly by those concerned with administrative efficiency and economy. It does not pretend to respond merely to those aims. Earlier I said that, "Many of the things people want to accomplish cannot be achieved through existing local governments." The reason we have governments is to allow people to do things, some of them perhaps unreasonable things, but things which are wanted and often desperately wanted to reflect their ambitions, to support their standard of living, to enrich their life. The glowing words of our great national documents were not written to voice platitudes but the aspirations of a free people. We have now become an urban people and our destiny now must be worked out in urban terms. It will not be easy. Politics never is. The result in the end may not be neat. That is not the way of legislation. But I am supremely confident that the forces of modern life, as we see them written here typically in the Washington metropolitan area, cannot be denied, and in finding expression for them I am equally confident that even in this unfortunately disinfranchised central city, the dominant interests of our people will seek and find appropriate recognition.

Matthew Fontaine Maury, the Pathfinder of the Seas

OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 23, 1959

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, one of the most erudite Members of the Senate and one of its greatest students of history is the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

On last Monday, January 19, the birthday of Gen. Robert E. Lee, the Senator from Virginia delivered a beautiful and most informative address on Matthew Fontaine Maury, "The Pathfinder of the Seas," to the Albemarle Chapter, No. 1, United Daughters of the Confederacy, at Charlottesville, Va. In his address the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] not only gave us a picture of Maury and of his monumental work, but he also spoke words of appreciation of Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson.

The Senator's paternal grandfather was a captain of infantry in the Stonewall Brigade and was killed at the bloody Battle of Cold Harbor. His maternal grandfather and nine of his grandfather's brothers served in the Army of Northern Virginia under General Lee, and five of them were killed.

In 1922 the junior Senator from Virginia, as a member of the State Senate of Virginia, sponsored a bill to provide for the erection of a monument to Matthew Fontaine Maury in his beloved Goshen Pass. The legislature passed the bill and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] was named chairman of the commission to select the monument and to arrange the exercises for its dedication. The dedication took place in 1923 and was a historic occasion.

The Senator from Virginia is himself a veteran of World War I, in which he served with honor and distinction.

I ask unanimous consent to have the Senator's eloquent address on Matthew Fontaine Maury printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR A. WILLIS ROBERTSON BEFORE THE ALBEMARLE CHAPTER, NO. 1, UNITED DAUGHTERS OF THE CONFEDERACY, CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA., JANUARY 19, 1959

My life, as most of you well know, has been lived within the shadows of the Blue Ridge Mountains. By inheritance, environment, and training, I am devoted to the memory of Confederate leaders and the principles of government for which they made sacrifices, never surpassed in the history of our Nation.

No one in the South could be more grateful than I for the wonderful work of the United Daughters of the Confederacy in preserving the memory of southern leaders. In doing so, they have not only helped to perpetuate in the hearts of all sons and daughters of the Confederacy the principles of States rights for which men like Lee, Jackson, and Maury made great personal sacrifices, but the Daughters of the Confederacy, through high idealism, and in refusing to admit that it was a lost cause, have set a standard of true greatness which both our Nation and the world have finally been willing to accept.

In all of recorded history, there never was a nobler man than Robert E. Lee and none who has left a greater imprint upon succeeding generations. Yet, shortly before his death, Lee, in his great humility, indicated he felt he had done nothing worthwhile saying, "Life is gliding away and I have nothing to show for mine. I pray I may be spared to accomplish something for the benefit of mankind and the honor of God." There is at least one historian who still lists Lee as a failure simply because he was the commander in chief of an army that suffered total defeat and the leader of a cause which that historian listed as a lost cause. But most historians, including the great Virginian, Douglas Southall Freeman, and the people generally of the entire Nation endorse the opinion of Lee expressed by Senator Ben Hill, of Georgia, when he said: "He was a foe without hate, a friend without treachery, a soldier without vices, and a victim without murmuring. He was a public officer without vices, a private citizen without wrong, a neighbor without reproach, a Christian without hypocrisy, and a man without guilt. He was Caesar without his ambition, Napoleon without his selfishness, and Washington without his reward. He was as obedient to authority as a servant and royal in authority as a king. He was as gentle as a woman in life, pure as a virgin in thought, watchful as a Roman vestal, submissive to law as Socrates, and grand in battle as Achilles."

Military experts throughout the world now rank Lee as one of the greatest military leaders of the English speaking peoples and second only to him, Thomas J. Stonewall Jackson, the great lieutenant on whom Lee so heavily relied. In the quiet and reserved VMI professor, in the consecrated Presbyterian deacon, who each Sunday morning taught a class of Negro slaves, no one in Lexington could visualize the military genius later to be displayed by Jackson in his famous valley campaign. Even his own soldiers at first misunderstood him. They thought him harsh, even cruel; but as their experience increased they recognized the wisdom of his severity and when they looked upon that kindly face, grave and determined as it was, they realized how closely his firmness was allied to tenderness. No one could, like him, unless it was Napoleon, establish and maintain discipline worthy of the best in the Anglo-Saxon nature, which had honor for its principle and glory for its reward. From him his soldiers and the people of his Southland learned the self-denial, which is the root of all religion, the self-control which is the root of all manliness. It was this discipline which enabled the first brigade to turn the tide of battle at Bull Run, or first Manassas. McDowell's men were carrying all before them and by an impetuous rush had carried Henry Hill which was a commanding point in the very center of the Confederate lines and the key of the battleground. Bee, Bartow, Evans, and Hampton were driven in and Jackson alone stood fast. General Bee, with his hat off, his sword in hand, covered with dust and his horse foaming, dashed up to Jackson and said: "General, they are beating us back." "Then, sir, we will give them the bayonet," said Jackson, as his thin lips closed like a vise. Bee, inspired by Jackson's confidence, galloped back to his broken lines and shouted: "Look, there is Jackson, standing like a stone wall. Rally behind the Virginians."

Notwithstanding military achievements of Confederate leaders which in themselves are proof of greatness, the United Daughters of the Confederacy have taught the South and the Nation the fundamental truth that true greatness is not based upon physical strength, political power, mental brilliancy, or accumulated wealth, but rather upon the type of sacrificial service that a man renders to his day and generation. Their test of unselfish love and devotion to duty as applied to our Confederate leaders goes beyond the political idealism of Pericles' tribute to the young men of Athens when he said: "So they gave their bodies to the commonwealth and received, each for his own memory, praise that will never die, and with it the grandest of all sepulchers, not that in which their mortal bones are laid, but a home in the minds of men, where their glory remains fresh to stir to speech or action as the occasion comes by. For the whole earth is the sepulcher of famous men; and their story is not graven only on stone over their native earth, but lives on far away, without visible symbol, woven into the stuff of other men's lives * * *."

Jackson gave his life for the cause and as a professional soldier who had suffered a major defeat it would have been easier for Lee to have done likewise because it will be recalled that he said shortly before he surrendered at Appomattox: "How easily I could be rid of this and be at rest. I have only to ride along the line and all will be over. But it is our duty to live. What will become of the women and children of the South if we are not here to protect them?" It was in that devotion to duty, to protect the women and children of the South and to train the youth of the South to repair the ravages of a fraternal war that Lee made his greatest contribution not only to his day and generation but to all succeeding generations.

We are now in a period when the heritage of constitutional liberty in which both North and South believed, although they were divided on how it should be preserved, is threatened anew by so-called liberals at home, who wittingly or not would take us down the road to socialism, and by Communists abroad who threaten to impose their will by force upon a free world. Therefore, for the preservation at home of those priceless principles of political and economic freedom that were born of the brain and purchased with the blood of our Founding Fathers we have never had a greater need to be reminded of the example set us by Confederate leaders like Lee, Jackson, and Maury.

We also live in a time when men are challenging the statement of the Roman philosopher, Seneca: "There is no easy road from the earth to the stars." Rockets are shot into outer space and brought back with data which scientists assure us will chart a pathway through the skies. Manmade missiles have penetrated beyond the moon and our Government is appropriating millions of dollars to continue these studies and experiments. Hence, the appropriateness of the request of your program committee that I speak primarily tonight concerning the greatest scientist of the Confederacy, Matthew Fontaine Maury. While these annual celebrations normally are held on January 19, the well-known birthday of the immortal Lee, it perhaps is not so well known that the birthday of Maury was January 14 and that of Jackson, January 21. Like Lee and Jackson, Maury's claim to immortality rests more securely upon his qualities of Christian character and his unselfish and constructive contributions to humanity than upon public recognition of his scientific achievements.

Maury was born in Spottsylvania County, Va., January 14, 1806. He entered the Navy as a midshipman in 1825 but 14 years later, when he was 33, he was thrown from the top of a stagecoach, having yielded his seat in the coach to a lady, and suffered a permanent lameness, which disqualified him for further active service at sea. In 1841 he was placed in charge of the Depot of Charts and Instruments, out of which grew the U.S. Naval Observatory and the Hydrographic Office. The weekly reports published by the Hydrographic Office in Washington are headed with this statement: "Founded upon the research made and the data collected by Lt. M. F. Maury, U.S. Navy." This is a recognition paid to no other naval officer.

When he was only 25 years old, Maury became convinced that the waves, the winds, the storms, the currents, the depths and temperatures of the sea constituted a system so mathematically interrelated that the mind of man could understand its phenomena and forecast its processes. The Prophet Job had written an explanation of God's power "Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea." Then David had written Maury's favorite passage, in the 107th Psalm:

"For He commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths; their soul is melted because of trouble. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wit's end. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and He bringeth them out of their distresses. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still."

The young Maury was firmly convinced that the same God who had made nature's laws for the dry land which man was beginning to understand also made them for the waters of the earth which likewise, through patient study and observance, could be understood. And so it was that Maury was able to discover the tradewinds and the ocean currents which reduced weeks of sailing time in Atlantic waters, and around the Cape of Good Hope to the Pacific, resulting in savings of millions of dollars to American shippers. Because of that monumental work, Maury was given the sobriquet "The Pathfinder of the Seas."

Maury's pinnacle moment was yet to come. His system of sea lanes had been utilized chiefly by American ships, his coworkers being chiefly Americans, but Maury wanted all nations to cooperate with the U.S. observatory for the benefit of the maritime interests of the whole world. So, he called an international conference to meet in Brussels in August 1853. That might properly be termed the first League of Nations. It included Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, France, Portugal, Great Britain, and the United States—representing 95 percent of the shipping of the world. The conference lasted 16 days, Maury's charts were unanimously adopted, and for the next 50 years those nations cooperated in exchanging maritime information along the lines proposed by Maury. But typical of Maury's modesty in declining to accept the presidency of the league was the reply he made to the praise that was given to the value of his scientific research: "I am extremely grateful for the sympathy you have expressed and the praise you have been pleased to bestow on my humble efforts. On my part I beg to thank you for the kind assistance that you have afforded me. Allow me to add that we are taking part in a proceeding to which we should vainly seek for a parallel in history. Heretofore, when naval officers of different nations met in such numbers, it was to deliberate at the cannons' mouths upon the most efficacious means of destroying the human species. Today, on the contrary, we see assembled the delegates of almost every maritime nation for the noble purpose of serving humanity by seeking to render navigation more and more secure. I think, gentlemen, we may congratulate ourselves with pride upon the opening of this new era."

Time will not permit me to enumerate the details of Maury's remarkable career but they can be summarized by saying that in addition to founding the Naval Observatory, his magazine articles resulted in the founding of the U.S. Naval Academy, he furnished the data necessary for the laying of the first transatlantic cable and he was the real father of the Weather Bureau which grew out of his recommendations to the Government when he was a professor of physics at the Virginia Military Institute.

Maury had formulated the plan for the weather bureau for the benefit of farmers as well as mariners when he was head of the naval observatory but war came before he could perfect his plans. We find this significant statement, however, in one of his sailing directions to accompany the wind and current charts published in 1858: "As much as we have accomplished at sea, more yet can be accomplished through the magnetic telegraph on land. With a properly devised system of meteorological observations to be made at certain stations wherever the telegraph spreads its meshes, and to be reported daily by telegrams to a properly organized office, the shipping in the harbors of our seaport towns, the husbandman in the field, and the traveler on the road may all be warned of every extensive storm that visits our shores and while yet it is a great way off."

When Virginia seceded from the Union in 1861, Maury, like Lee, threw in his lot with the South and became head of coasts, harbors, and river defenses. He invented the electric torpedo for harbor defenses and because of his international fame as a scientist, President Jefferson Davis sent him to England in 1862 to procure torpedo materials. Maury remained in England until 1868 where he received signal honors, including an honorary degree from Cambridge. Both Russia and France offered him the directorship of their imperial observatories. But Maury loved his native Virginia, and like Lee, he felt he owed a duty to the youth of the South. So, turning down offers that would have meant international fame as a scientist, a life of wealth and ease, Maury returned to a professorship at VMI where he labored for the rest of his life seeking to solve the riddles of nature, particularly for the benefit of the farmer in connection with weather reports and passing on to younger men his thirst for scientific knowledge.

In utilizing his chair of physics as a sounding board for a national program in behalf of a weather bureau, Maury overtaxed his strength. Returning from a lecture in St. Louis, he knew that his career was near its close. He knew that the task of interpreting nature in terms of help rather than of hindrance for mankind had been permanently advanced by his efforts. The end came quietly on February 1, 1873. "Do I drag my anchors?" he asked with a smile. "Yes," said his son. "All is well," he replied.

Maury loved the beauty of Goshen Pass and his last wish was that he be carried through the pass when the rhododendron and laurel were in bloom. It was the flowers that blossom in Goshen Pass in the spring that he wished placed upon his coffined body as the last and only tribute of affection:

"Wait till the laurel bursts its buds,
And creeping ivy flings its graces
About the lichen'd rocks, and floods
Of sunshine fill the shady places.

"Then, when the sky, the air, the grass,
Sweet nature all, is glad and tender,
Then bear me through the Goshen Pass
Amid its flush of May-day splendor."

Careless of monument by the grave he built it in the world—a monument by which man might be taught to remember not where he died but where he lived.

Maury was truly, as Dr. C. Alphonso Smith said at the dedication of the Goshen Pass monument, "founder of a new science, pilot of every ship that sails and herald of a new era of international cooperation."

If we of the present generation join with the Daughters of the Confederacy in Charlottesville and throughout our beloved Commonwealth in being true to the principles of Lee, Jackson, and Maury, there will undoubtedly be heard again the Bull Run battle cry, "Rally behind the Virginians."

The International Significance of Alaskan Statehood

OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, January 23, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, our colleague, the distinguished Senator from our newest State, Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], has recently written a most interesting article entitled "The International Significance of Alaskan Statehood," which appears in the winter 1958 edition of World Affairs. This article very ably illustrates the striking contrast that statehood for Alaska presents to the eyes of the world in comparison with the Soviet Union's treatment of its satellites. I commend to the reading of all Senators this splendid article.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by the distinguished Senator from Alaska be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INTERNATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE OF ALASKAN STATEHOOD

(By ERNEST GRUENING, U.S. Senator from Alaska)

The admission of Alaska to the Union as a State has substantial significance in international affairs.

It demonstrates that the United States practices what it preaches. It proves that the United States, true to its professions and to its best traditions, does not practice colonialism. It augurs a corresponding treatment for the Nation's only other incorporated Territory, Hawaii, and for the maximum of self-government of all other of the remaining dependent areas, Puerto Rico having already been granted the status its people desired. It shows that the United States is willing to break other precedents in order to extend to a noncontiguous area—for the first time in history—the full equality and sovereignty previously conferred on 35 States subsequent to the formation of the Nation.

Statehood for Alaska advances the frontiers of democracy to the continent's farthest North and West. It extends these frontiers of freedom for the first time into the Arctic and into the Eastern Hemisphere—for the Alaskan terrain reaches into both these parts of the globe.

What is particularly striking about this liberating action is that Alaska was once Russian-America. But for the vision and wisdom of William H. Seward, Alaska might still be groaning under the tyranny of Moscow.

Historically, not only was Alaska once part of what now has become the most brutal totalitarian regime in modern times, but, geographically, Alaska lies within naked-eye view of the Soviet police state. Only 54 miles separate Alaska and Siberia across Bering Strait. The Siberian headlands which rise to 11,000 feet are clearly seen from the Alaskan mainland. They are visible also from St. Lawrence Island, an Alaskan island in the Bering Sea.

Two other islands, Little Diomede and Big Diomede, the former American, the latter Russian, lie within 2½ miles of each other. Thus Alaska is the nearest free country to the Soviet State and the contrast between these two adjacent systems of government and the two ways of life is revealed for the whole world to see.

This contrast and this difference may be specifically illustrated by what has happened on the two Diomedes. Both islands were formerly inhabited by Eskimos, there being a small village on each, both extant before the coming of the white man. The American Eskimos continue to live there, following their peaceable pursuits, enjoying the blessings of liberty, as loyal and patriotic a group of Americans as can be found under the flag. I was happy to enlist those who were not in the Armed Forces in our Alaska Territorial Guard in the early days of World War II; and they are now active members of the Alaska National Guard, enrolled in its scout battalions.

In contrast, Russia's Eskimos on Big Diomede have been uprooted from their ancestral homes and forcibly deported to the mainland of Siberia. With that deportation, the friendly visiting that had taken place between the inhabitants of the two islands for generations, ceased abruptly.

Thus we have in those far northern latitudes a striking illustration of contrasting freedom and serfdom. It is to be hoped that our Voice of America will make clear to the world the profound difference between Uncle Sam's treatment of its dependencies—for Alaska was such a dependency prior to statehood—and Russia's treatment of its satellites.

Alaska versus Hungary. Gaze on this picture and on that.

In the one case there is the grant of full equality. There is application by due process of law of that most basic of American principles, the principle of government by consent of the governed. In the other case we have, by a dictatorial exercise of power, forcible deportation and the suppression of freedom which in varying degree all Russian subjects suffer.

In the continuing struggle for the understanding and sympathy of the wavering and uncommitted peoples of the earth, Alaskan statehood should be of great value as a shining example.

"By their deeds ye shall know them." The deed of making Alaska the 49th State in the American Union speaks far more loudly than words could.

That the 49th State was once Russian-American, that it is, geographically, Russia's nearest neighbor belonging to the free world—for all Russia's other neighbors have been subverted to the Kremlin's rule—sounds a clarion call to all mankind.

Alaskan statehood exceeds the propaganda value of a dozen sputniks. It is a missile—an intercontinental missile suggests itself—which cannot be intercepted and carries its message to the ends of the earth for all time.

Highway Legislation

OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
Friday, January 23, 1959

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two speeches which I recently delivered before groups interested in highway construction. The first one was given December 1, 1958, at San Francisco before the American Association of State Highway Officials and the second one, January 19, 1959, before the American Road Builders Association in Dallas, Tex.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROBLEMS AHEAD

Roadbuilding in the United States is the outstanding example of a working partnership between the several States and the Federal Government. You are the people who carry out the program of that partnership. We Members of Congress may write the charter of the partnership—but if the program is to be successful, the terms and the modifications must be based upon an understanding of the conditions which you encounter at the grassroots of action.

That is why, Mr. President, your representatives are so welcome at congressional hearings. It is also why we welcome these opportunities to rub shoulders and exchange views with you at these annual meetings of your association. All of us have our responsibilities in the partnership.

To illustrate the responsibilities of partnership or teamwork in a negative way, I like the story told me by an old prospector friend in the Black Hills. His search for the elusive El Dorado took him, some years ago, into the northern part of Canada. There he employed as guide a native who was part Indian, part French in blood.

The guide told him one night that they were near the place where the British Hudson Bay Company had lost a fur trader some years before. The trader had died during a hard winter and those with him buried his body in the frozen earth. Next summer, the Hudson Bay Company sent a party into the northlands in an effort to find the grave and recover the body. They employed some of the natives to assist them. The guide of my prospector friend, however, was employed that time not as a guide, but as a cook.

The party searched for several weeks in vain. They did not recover the body of the lost fur trader. My prospector friend from the Black Hills said to his half-breed guide, "That was sure too bad. I wonder where he could have been buried."

"Oh," the guide said to him, "You want to see the grave? I show you."

"What," my prospector friend said, "Do you know where it is?"

"Sure do," the guide replied, "I show you."

"But," my friend said, "Why didn't you lead the Hudson Bay party to it?"

"Oh," his guide came back, "On that trip I not hired to guide. My job to cook, so I cook, not guide."

DIFFERENT APPROACH NEEDED

Needless to say, such an approach to a Federal-State partnership in roadbuilding would leave many problems unsolved. Unless there be an understanding at the Federal legislative level of your problems in the field at the roadbuilding level, and at your end an understanding of our legislative problems, and at both levels a spirit of, and freedom in, teamwork, we would not get the job done. That there has been good progress, outstanding progress in the past year on all Federal-aid systems is evidence of excellent understanding and teamwork.

During the last session of Congress, three bills were passed which were the result of outstanding teamwork, teamwork within our congressional committees, teamwork with the Bureau of Public Roads, and teamwork with the highway officials of the several States. The three were:

1. The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958.

2. The General Highway Act of 1958, which codifies and brings together all of the Federal highway legislation in one compact statute.

3. The act to amend the Federal Aid Act of 1958 by extending for an additional year, 1960, the estimate of costs on the Interstate System so that apportionments could be made for the customary biennium.

This last act would not have been passed without the help given by your association officers in bringing out the inconvenience and delay that would have been created in the several States had the many legislatures which meet in January not known the Federal aid apportionment for the second year of the biennium for which they customarily provide.

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY-EIGHT AID ACT NOTABLE

In addition to the usual features of the regular biennial Federal aid act, the first bill that I cited, the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1958 was notable, I think, for these things:

1. Acceptance of the new cost estimates as the basis for making apportionments of funds for the Interstate System. That was a definite break from the old area-mileage-population basis.

2. Establishment of a modified form of billboard regulation on the new right-of-way portions of the Interstate System.

3. Creation of the emergency fund of $400 million for auxiliary construction of roads not on the Interstate System, the so-called "D" fund of the Bureau which States might use on the other Federal aid systems in the way best calculated to meet their emergency needs with matching "L" funds advanced, if needed, on an automatic repayment or deduction basis.

4. Provision for hearings for rural people on highway locations, giving them the same right previously accorded bypassed towns and cities.

Those were all notable legislative accomplishments, I think, and they reflected teamwork in the field of roadbuilding for the United States.

NEW PROBLEMS AHEAD

The coming session of Congress opening in January will bring some very definite problems. On them we will need your counsel and help. Of many that might be mentioned, I shall discuss briefly three:

1. Adequate financing for the trust fund.

2. A demand for greater highway safety.

3. Requests by States for recognition of money they have put into free roads and toll roads that are on the Interstate System.

I will take them up in reverse order.

First, then, as to the requests by States for recognition of the money they have put into both free roads and toll roads that have become a part of the Interstate System.

I must frankly admit that I did not realize the importance of this matter to some States until I drove to New York, up the Thruway, and into Connecticut and into Massachusetts and saw what splendid and expensive modern highways were being or had been built on the initiative of those States without getting apportionments on a 90-to-10 basis of Federal aid, yet which would be parts of the Interstate System.

In New York, for example, I was told that 540 miles of the 1,210 miles of interstate in that State, are on that toll road—a project with a construction cost of $800 million absorbed into the Federal system without earning as of this time any credit in the apportionments to that State. Also, that an additional $100 million would be put into bridges and traffic separations as a part of the Interstate System but financed by tolls and getting no recognition in apportionments.

In Kansas, I am told, one-half of her toll road system is similarly incorporated into the Interstate System without reimbursement. And a similar point could be made for toll roads in New Jersey, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana.

INTEGRATION OF STATE ROADS

But if this point can be made for States with toll roads that are incorporated into the Interstate System without reimbursement, what about the same States and other States which see many miles of roads that have been paid for on a regular 50–50 matching basis and are put into the system without either tolls or apportionment to reimburse the States? Obviously, they are entitled to consideration, too.

During a hearing on this matter, last spring, we were told by the Bureau of Public Roads that $4.83 billion would be required to reimburse the several States if they were to be reimbursed at this time for the depreciated value of all the roads, toll and free, that are being made a part of the Interstate System.

That figure illustrates the difficulty of doing anything with the problem at this time. It would take the funds equal to 2 years of past apportionments to fully reimburse the States on that basis. I am sure that no one wants to suspend the construction program for 2 years in order to do that.

The Bureau of Public Roads, however, is under a congressional directive to report to the next Congress on possible formulas for reimbursement. While recognizing there is merit in the principle of reimbursement, I for one believe we cannot accept any formula which would interrupt or delay the construction program now underway. I hope your association will feel the same way about it.

HIGHWAY SAFETY IMPORTANT

A second problem which I predict will receive increasing attention in Congress is that of highway safety. Public opinion will not forever tolerate the casualty lists that papers carry today of fatalities and injuries due to highway accidents.

In the last Congress, no less than 30 bills were introduced which proposed to deal with highway safety in one way or another. Five of them proposed studies and investigations—notwithstanding the parts of existing law which place upon the Bureau of Public Roads the responsibility for a continuing study of accidents and efforts to reduce them by methods of design and construction.

The Bureau of Public Roads has studied and analyzed and is installing electronic equipment better to catalog types and causes of accidents—but no mere classifying of accidents is going to correct the situation unless we have the courage to enact necessary legislation at State and Federal levels.

Three separate bills proposed requiring safety belts to be installed on automobiles sold in interstate commerce. Three others proposed speed limitations with speedometer control or other devices.

One bill would sanction interstate compacts to promote highway safety while another would encourage the establishment of uniform traffic laws throughout the several States. Another would require luminous buttons or strips on freight cars in an effort to prevent broadside crashes into trains stopped at or passing highway crossings. Another would reward acts of heroism by drivers of motor vehicles under carrier regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This review does not exhaust the list or the approaches to the problem but should suffice to indicate a growing consciousness on the part of Members of Congress that something should be done to reduce the accidents that, in round figures, are killing 40,000 people a year in the United States and injuring three to four times that number, with a terrible cost in pain, suffering, lost time, broken families, maimed and crippled people—to say nothing of high insurance rates.

STUDIES UNDERWAY

Executive agencies are making studies of accidents. In addition to the activities of the Bureau of Public Roads under section 117 of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 in attempting to classify accidents by types, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has completed 1 year of fieldwork in an effort to evaluate national well-being in terms of highway accidents.

I am told that these studies bring out a lack of uniformity in definition and reporting of accidents and their causes. The Bureau of Public Roads is trying to get statistics on a fairly uniform basis from 11 States. This data will be put through an electronic high-speed computer in an attempt to determine accident rates by speed, type of vehicle and kind of driver. An intensive accident investigation project is underway at Northwestern University. The President's Committee for Traffic Safety plans to present legislative needs to the several State legislatures.

These steps are all to the good—but it is becoming increasingly clear, I believe, that mechanical devices in the cars and safety designs in highway construction will not of themselves prevent many of the most tragic accidents which are catalogued under the head of reckless driving.

I was impressed some months ago to see an article in the Saturday Evening Post with this title: "We Jail Drunken Drivers." The article was by Goodwin J. Knight, Governor of California—so in the State which is host to this convention, I offer my commendation for his frank statement of a policy which other States might well adopt.

DRUNKEN DRIVING

Somehow since the repeal of the Prohibition amendment it has seemed to be regarded as politically unethical to propose legislation to deal with excessive use of liquor and dangerous to report that an accident in early morning hours was due to careless driving by a drunken driver. That, of course, is not always the cause but many an innocent life has been snuffed out in an accident labeled as reckless driving where the circumstances clearly indicate a more precise cause could be given.

We can design and build roads and intersections for greater safety but all this will be for naught unless the man or woman, the boy or girl at the wheel has the competence and the sense of responsibility necessary to drive safely for those they meet on the road as well as those who ride with them.

Police powers under the Constitution rest with the States—but I do not hesitate to say that if the States fail to enact adequate and effective legislation on car inspection, driver tests and driver performance, the Federal Government will find a way to do so. An aroused public opinion will demand that it do so.

ADEQUATE HIGHWAY FINANCING

I come now to the first problem that I listed—perhaps the one that is first in priority as a mechanical matter of highway legislation—namely, that of adequate financing for the highway trust fund.

We are told that revenues accruing to the trust fund during the fiscal year 1957 and 1958 totaled $3,526 million, or $41 million more than the original estimates. During the first 4 months of this fiscal year, the revenues have been slightly below estimates.

Last spring and summer Congress passed, and the President approved, legislation directing that the full amount for the several Federal aid systems should be apportioned to the States notwithstanding the provisions of the so-called Byrd amendment which is found in section 209(g) of the 1956 Highway Act. That is the portion of law which says that apportionments for Interstate System aid for any fiscal year may not exceed the amounts expected to be available in the trust fund to liquidate obligations resulting from such apportionments.

As a result of that waiver of the Byrd amendment, full apportionments were made for 1959 and 1960. Under present law, money will have to be borrowed from the general funds of the Treasury to meet the obligations that will accrue under the apportionments. But also, under existing law, amounts so borrowed must be repaid and those repayments must be provided for before apportionments can be made for 1961 and subsequent years.

I am advised by the Bureau of Public Roads, then, that on the basis of present estimates, there will be no funds available to make apportionments for the Interstate System for the fiscal year 1961. And that the interstate apportionment for fiscal 1962 could not exceed $600 million and that thereafter the interstate apportionment would range from $1.3 to $1.5 billion per year in accordance with amounts estimated to be available in the highway trust fund for the interstate program, instead of the $2.5 billion authorized in the basic legislation if available. Congressman FALLON told us this morning that the prospective shortage in the fund may even reduce the apportionment for ABC roads by $200 million for 1 year if the fund is not rehabilitated.

FIVE POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS

This creates a situation which must engage the attention of the public works committees and roads subcommittees in the next Congress. One does not have to be a prophet to predict that there will be a variety of opinions on what to do about it. At least five possible solutions suggest themselves:

1. Place the burden of rehabilitating the trust fund on the general funds of the Treasury.

2. Increase the present tax levies which go into the trust fund, meaning most likely an increase in the Federal gasoline tax.

3. Adopt some new or additional levies and dedicate the revenue to the highway trust fund.

4. Authorize a special bond issue to cover the anticipated shortage in the trust fund and extend the period of time for which the special levies are now authorized from a total of 16 years to 17 or 18 years, or whatever may be needed to retire the bonds.

5. Modify the scope of or standards required in the Interstate System; in other words, a stretchout.

I shall give only a sentence or two of comment upon each of these possibilities. I have no doubt each one present has some idea about them.

Resolution No. 1

On solution No. 1, the taking of funds from the Treasury, we can expect vigorous opposition, not only from the Treasury Department but from powerful Members of Congress in both parties who resist any move to increase the national debt. Many of these people are members of the House Ways and Means Committee or of the Senate Committee on Finance who would pass upon any legislation dealing with the subject.

To propose the assigning to the trust fund of any revenues from levies or excise taxes not now dedicated to that fund would be regarded as equivalent to taking the deficit money from the general funds of the Treasury and would meet the same opposition.

Such a solution, in my judgment, could not be enacted into law. If it should pass Congress, which is doubtful, I would expect a Presidential veto that could not be overridden in the face of the present high national debt and the prospect of $10 or $12 billion deficit in the current fiscal year.

With regard to solution No. 2, an increase of the Federal gas tax, there will be some support, possibly administration support. For myself, I cannot be enthusiastic about such a solution. Many States either raised their gasoline tax in the last legislature or faced that possibility for next year. Public opinion would react badly to another Federal gasoline-tax increase—at least, until the new highway building, and particularly the Interstate System, has had more of a chance to show the economies and benefits that can flow from this development.

In passing I would make this observation: people who travel toll roads and pay 1½ cents per mile for the privilege are paying the equivalent of a 22-cent gas tax, assuming that the average car makes 15 miles per gallon.

In time, if the Interstate System achieves the acceptability that toll roads have won, an increase in the gas tax may be popular as a means of expediting conclusion of the system. That time is not yet.

It must be kept in mind that a great many people do not travel and will not be near to any part of the Interstate System. An increase in the gas tax will be paid by them as well as by Interstate Highway users. True the ABC roads come out of the trust fund but the Interstate apportionments take more than twice as much money as do the ABC roads. It is also to be kept in mind that an increase in gas taxes also makes a levy on those who use and pay for the toll roads.

Thus a solution based upon increasing the Federal gas tax will have its problems even though the method is appealing from the standpoint of easy administration and costs of collection.

Resolution No. 3

As for solution No. 3: New levies or sources of revenue. Only one comes to my mind, the possibility of employing a windshield sticker as a highway use fee to be collected by selling a stamp at the postoffices as was done during the war.

Publicity on the fact that the proceeds from the windshield stamp were to be used to pay for the road program would help but could hardly make this plan popular. A $5 stamp for passenger cars and a graduated stamp for pickups, trucks and buses could raise from $400 million to $900 million per year, depending, of course, upon the size of the stamps required for trucks and buses.

Even at the lower figure, with an even $5 stamp for all motor vehicles on the highways, the receipts if continued for the remaining period of the original 16-year levy period would probably retire or liquidate any shortage in the trust fund. This approach to the problem should be explored along with other possible solutions.

Solution No. 4: The authorization of a special bond issue with the bonds to be retired by extension of the period of time for existing levels dedicated to the trust fund is the one for which I have heard most congressional support.

It has the defect, of course, of adding to the national debt, either directly or indirectly. However, it would have the virtue of carrying a specific plan for retirement of that debt increase which cannot be said for most other increases of the debt. Certainly this proposal deserves serious consideration.

Resolution No. 5

As for No. 5—modification of the scope or standards now required for the Interstate System, you may expect this answer to be pushed by some influential people.

An example came to my attention on my way to this gathering. The Deseret News-Salt Lake Telegram for November 29, 1958, devoted its major editorial to the subject and closed with these questions:

"Why can we not slow down the construction program, in other words, to fit the receipts rolling in? Those receipts amount to staggering totals—$8 billion by 1960, for example, which is just eight times the largest yearly amount ever spent by the Federal Government for highways before this highway program was adopted. Are expenditures of that magnitude really so inadequate?"

With a Federal budget facing a $12 billion deficit and new taxes unpopular, this attitude will develop support in many places.

So—we who are engaged in the building of a modern highway system for the people of the United States face some problems as we approach the year 1959 and a new session of Congress.

It would be possible for members of your association to say, "Oh, well, it is the business of Congress to find answers to these problems."

Similarly, members of the Committees of Public Works could say, "Oh, well, it is the business of the Finance and Ways and Means Committees to find the revenue to pay the bills. We are only supposed to map programs that will develop the country."

To such attitudes, however, I respectfully recall the story of the guide my prospector friend found up north. If he was hired to cook, he felt no obligation to be a guide, he had no feeling about teamwork. None of us desires a stretchout in the interstate program but if that is to be avoided, there must be an answer to the question: where do we get the money for the trust funds? We cannot dispose of it by saying that we were only hired to cook. Someone must guide.

I said at the first of my remarks that road building in the United States has been the outstanding example of a working partnership between the several States and the Federal Government.

Under the inspiration of the message of President Eisenhower to the Governors' conference in 1955, the greatest roadbuilding program for this or any other nation in the history of the world was authorized and begun.

Each year, the dollar volume for that program is 10 times greater than the original cost of the Panama Canal. Everyone who has a part in this program, everyday worker, contractor, engineer, highway official, legislator or Congressman has a right to take pride in the program.

It is a constructive program not a destructive one. While valuable for national defense, its primary benefits are from day to day in adding to the pleasures, conveniences and welfare of the people in peacetime.

It is a partnership job—and I am confident that the Congress will have in the future, as it has had in the past, the counsel and the support of the American Association of State Highway Officials.

HIGHWAY FINANCING

(Remarks of Senator FRANCIS CASE, of South Dakota, before the American Road Builders Association, Dallas, Tex., January 19, 1959)

The big road program is rolling. In 1958 $6.2 billion went to work on roads in the United States, an all-time high.

Congress passed its regular biennial highway act with approval of the revised cost estimates and authorized using them for making apportionments for the Interstate System for 1960 and 1961, at a rate of $2.5 billion for each year, started an annual increased increment of $25 million per year on the ABC roads, provided a new D program with $400 million for emergency or problem areas within the States, and wound up with a single act codifying all highway acts and their amendments into one compact document.

It was a notable year for roadbuilders in Congress, at the Bureau of Public Roads, in the several State highway departments and out on the highways and byways where the people want—and now are getting—better roads.

WHERE TO GET THE MONEY

But, as Federal Highway Administrator Bert Tallamy said to the American Association of State Highway officials at San Francisco a month ago, "It would be near the truth to say that all our problems are practically solved except the big one."

That big one, of course, is that old pocketbook problem—where are you going to get the money? The highway trust fund will, prospectively, be out of cash when the ABC apportionments are made in June this year for fiscal year 1961 and there will be nothing on which to make the 1961 apportionments for the Interstate System.

That will be due to the operation of section 209(b) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956, known as the Byrd amendment.

Similarly, only $600 million will be available for the authorized $2.5 billion for 1962. Thereafter the interstate apportionment would range from $1.7 billion to $1.8 billion per year, roughly three-fourths of the authorizations.

BILLIONS SHORT

Put another way, over the span of the remaining years of the interstate program, the highway trust fund will be short a gross total of $13.3 billion, under present estimates. It adds up this way:

	Billions
Increased cost estimates on Interstate System (including the added 1,000 miles to 41,000)	$10.4
Increase ABC apportionments by $25 million per year up to an annual $1 billion per year	1.5
Allowance for the Federal or public land road items	1.0
New D program for problem areas	0.4

Or, if we allow for contingencies, we could add $200 million and round off the problem at $13.5 billion for the 10 years.

To meet the immediate problem of apportionments for fiscal 1961 and 1962, I understand that the President's budget message being sent to the Congress today will probably recommend an additional gas tax levy of 1½ cents per gallon. That, it is estimated, will yield $1.7 billion per year, and supply the three-fourths deficiency indicated for those years.

The Bureau of Public Roads, by congressional directive, is presently engaged in making comprehensive studies from coast to coast to get a better idea of the distribution of benefits from improved highways. We in Congress directed the study in the belief that it would give guides which would be useful in future legislation, particularly in any reshifting of taxes or increase of levies.

ALTERNATIVE FINANCING METHODS

An increase in the gas tax is not the only method of meeting the problem which has been suggested. Other approaches mentioned include:

1. Taking funds from the General Treasury, which, of course would add to the Treasury's current deficit prospects.

2. Allocating to the trust fund the proceeds of certain excise taxes already levied, which, of course, would have the same effect on the Federal deficits and debt.

3. Giving special borrowing authority to the trust fund to go into the market and sell short- or long-term obligations to meet actual cash requirements and extending existing levies beyond 1972 to meet them.

4. Extension or readjustment of the authorized building program.

There is one other complication which I think has not been faced but which I foresee; namely, that Alaska at once, and Hawaii in the near future, will be asking for an allocation of some funds on a 90-percent Federal basis for the construction of some part of their highways, with controlled access design to connect principal points, even though a strictly interstate connection may not be possible. The new States will be paying the same Federal gas tax that other States do.

So, there is the big problem. I could discuss it further, but I anticipate that the question and answer plan for the panel will bring out the particular phases of the problem and possible solutions that are of most interest to you.

I assure you, President Steelman and delegates, that it is always a pleasure to meet with you and to get the benefit of your counsel as well as to share your enthusiasms in the great job of building better roads for a better America.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 26, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Isaiah 12: 2: The Lord Jehovah is my strength, my song, and my salvation.

Infinite and eternal God, as we continue to address ourselves to the responsibilities of this new day, may we be blessed with the spirit of wholehearted devotion.

Expand and enlarge our feelings of concern and considerateness for Thy needy children who are hungry and homeless and hopeless.

Daily may we gird ourselves with courage and confidence as we seek to build a world fellowship ruled by the ideals and principles of the lowly man of Galilee.

We thank Thee for the life and ministry of our colleague whom Thou hast called unto Thyself to dwell with Thee in eternal blessedness. Grant unto the members of his family the consolations of Thy grace.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 22, 1959, was read and approved.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces there will be no business today except a request from the majority leader and the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

TODAY'S SPECIAL ORDERS TRANSFERRED

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that special orders granted for today may be transferred to tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, without establishing a precedent, in view of the death of our colleague, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may extend their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today and include therein extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

THE LATE HON. GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret, and a deep sense of personal loss, that I announce the unexpected and untimely death of our colleague, Congressman GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, of Missouri.

He fell as falls the soldier in press of battle and with his face to the front.

He died as he would have preferred to die, with his harness on and driving hard, full speed ahead in behalf of those who sent him here, and for what he conceived to be the best interests of his people and his country.

He was one of the most lovable men I ever knew; and he was one of the most effective Members of the House and represented, to a degree seldom equaled by Members of the Congress, the wishes and interests of his neighbors and his constituents.

He was one of the few men, if not the only man, approved during his first term, to answer in the catch-as-catch-can debate on the floor attacks by the opposition on pending agricultural legislation. He understood the needs and problems of agriculture from firsthand experience and his short, terse interpolations discomfited many a speaker and exposed the fallacy of many carefully prepared speeches.

His career was a striking example of the freedom of opportunity and the limitless possibilities offered under our form of government. Starting as a young man without land or capital or influence, he amassed a competency including hundreds of acres of land, with every facility of stock and equipment. From this farm he went to the greatest parliament in the world.

There was no proposal or plan or program of credit or conservation or cooperation offered by the Department of Agriculture in his long and busy life in which he was not a participant. The soundness of his position on farm questions was that he spoke from firsthand knowledge and an intimate familiarity with every phase of farm production and management. Supplemented by unerring judgment and a wide knowledge of public affairs, he served his district and his State with remarkable efficiency.

When he announced his candidacy to succeed himself in the 86th Congress he was handicapped physically and politically to the extent that his opponents marked him for slaughter and even his friends despaired at times. But through sheer courage and endurance he fought through a spirited primary and election to win a decisive victory. He won on his record of service and the warm friendship of thousands whom he had befriended and benefited collectively and individually.

He started his business life with but one asset, the young wife he had just married. And through the years, until her loss at the close of his first term in Congress, she remained his principal asset.

They reared nine children—seven stalwart sons and two charming daughters. In talking with one of them I realized, without being told, what a wonderful father he had been. The Fourth District loses a constructive statesman. The State loses a great Missourian. But they have lost a father.

Our hearts go out to them.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following material as a part of my remarks.

BUTLER BAPTIST CHURCH,
Butler, Missouri, January 28, 1959.

IN REMEMBRANCE

God hath not promised
Skies always blue,
Flower-strewn pathways
All our lives through;
God hath not promised
Sun without rain,
Joy without sorrow,
Peace without pain.

But God hath promised
Strength for the day,
Rest for the labor,
Light for the way.
Grace for the trials,
Help from above,
Unfailing sympathy,
Undying love.

RESOLUTION

Whereas God in His infinite mercy has taken GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER from our midst; and

Whereas GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, for many years and while serving in the Congress of the United States, has given freely of his time to help the veterans, their widows and children, and, more particularly, veterans who have not been able to fully care for themselves; and

Whereas GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER has sponsored and championed the cause of the veteran, his widow and his children, in the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER on many occasions intervened and interceded in behalf of the veteran, his widow and his children, before many Federal agencies; and

Whereas not only because of GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER'S great and unselfish work in behalf of the veteran, but also because of his personal splendid character, his great integrity, and his intense loyalty to serve the veteran, his widow and his children: Wherefore be it

Resolved, That the Jackson County Council of the Veterans of Foreign Wars by this humble gesture passed and unanimously adopted so that the records of the council, by this resolution, will reveal an outstanding, unselfish and tireless worker in behalf of the veteran, and one who contributed much to the aims and the purposes of the Jackson County Council of the Veterans of Foreign Wars in their efforts in behalf of the veteran; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the family of GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER.

KANSAS CITY, MO., January 26, 1959.

To the Family of the Late Congressman,
GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, Butler, Mo.:

Now while the heart is heavy
You may not see the way,
Or look to the far horizon
For a brighter, fairer day,
And yet in the very present
Are hearts whose love is true,
And time with mystic healing
Will bring sweet peace to you.

DEAR CHILDREN: I want to say the farmers and laboring people of the United States have lost one of their greatest friends, and the State of Missouri, one of the finest citizens, we were ever privileged to have.

Your father was honest, courageous, and never feared to do the right. Nowadays you can count them on your fingers.

Hope each and every one of you will follow in his footsteps and make outstanding men and women.

God bless you.

KITTIE WALLACE YOUNG.

THE ANACONDA CO.,
Washington, D.C., January 27, 1959.

Mr. RAY J. RATLIFF,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR RAY: It was a great shock to hear of the sudden death of Congressman CHRISTOPHER.

He was a fine and sincere man, and I know will be a great loss to the Congress of the United States.

We wish to extend to you and Mrs. Ratliff our deepest sympathy in your bereavement.

Sincerely yours,

A. E. WILKINSON.
MABEL L. MCGRATH.

KANSAS CITY, MO., January 24, 1959.

Mrs. MOINA E. RATLIFF,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MOINA: I awoke this morning to the sound of my radio announcing the passing of the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER. As you may know I received a telegram from Mr. CHRISTOPHER yesterday, January 23, notifying me of his nomination for me to the Air Force Academy. I had planned to write a letter of thanks this morning, but his passing makes it hard to put in words just what to say. I wish to express my sympathy to you, his family, and the rest of the office staff in these trying days. This gives me even more reason to win an appointment to the Academy to show the people who were connected with him his ability to pick young men as leaders of tomorrow. Again I wish to express my deepest sympathy.

I am,

Very sincerely,

THOMAS G. ASHBY.

WARRENSBURG PRODUCTION
CREDIT ASSOCIATION,
Warrensburg, Mo., January 28, 1959.

The GEORGE CHRISTOPHER Family,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR FRIENDS: It is with deep regret that we have learned of the passing of our friend, production credit member, and Congressman. We know of the tireless efforts put forth by Mr. CHRISTOPHER, not only for the continued growth of production credit, but for agriculture in general. He was a man who would not let opposition deter him in his endeavors for the things he believed in.

The loss of Mr. CHRISTOPHER will be keenly felt by all who knew him, and admired him for his integrity.

On behalf of the production credit association, board, and staff, we extend our heartfelt sympathy.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL V. SLUSHER,
President, Board of Directors.

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., January 26, 1959.

Mrs. RAY J. RATLIFF,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MRS. RATLIFF: It was my good fortune to have been counsel for the Veterans' Affairs Committee for the past 11 years and during this time, of course, I became acquainted with your father, the late Congressman CHRISTOPHER.

I was saddened to read in the paper Saturday morning of his passing and feel that I have lost a real friend. I got acquainted with him in the work of the committee but more particularly when I was along at a hearing in which he was interested in Kansas City a few years ago. I shall always remember his keen sense of humor and how reasonable he was to work with.

My sympathy goes out to you and other members of your family in your loss.

Sincerely,

EDWIN B. PATTERSON,
Manager.

MISSOURI STATE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ASSOCIATION,
Jefferson City, Mo., February 3, 1959.

Mrs. RAY J. RATLIFF,
Butler, Mo.

DEAR MRS. RATLIFF: In the belief you would rather have not been bothered with letters of condolences during the period of great sorrow and shock that was suddenly thrust upon you and your family, I have purposely withheld writing you.

As I'm sure you are fully aware, I considered Mr. CHRISTOPHER one of the truly great men that it has been my pleasure to know. Without a doubt, the farmers and common people throughout Missouri and the Nation have lost one of their greatest leaders and friends. One of the most pleasant memories of my life will be the simple fact that I not only worked with Congressman GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, but that I knew beyond all doubt that he considered me as a trusted friend.

On behalf of every official of our association may I extend to you and the other members of your family our deepest sympathy.

Sincerely yours,

JULIUS HELM,
General Manager.

BARTON COUNTY ELECTRIC CO-OP, INC.,
Lamar, Mo., February 16, 1959.

Mr. JULIUS HELM,
General Manager, Missouri State Rural Electrification Association, Jefferson City, Mo.

DEAR JULIUS: As per your request, I have attempted to rewrite the eulogy delivered at the congressional breakfast on February 10. The wording is probably not exactly the same; however, it is substantially correct. Please use your own judgment in editing and rewording as might be desirable.

"Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, there is nothing I can say here this morning that would pay proper tribute to the memory of one of the greatest champions of the causes of our rural people.

"I am speaking, of course, about the Honorable GEORGE CHRISTOPHER who was Congressman from my district.

"I think we should observe a moment of silence as a token of our esteem; will you please stand.

"Thank you, ladies and gentlemen."

I hope this will answer the request.

Sincerely yours,
CHAS. W. HOLCOMB, Manager.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY CLERKS,
GATEWAY LODGE NO. 2024,
Kansas City, Mo., March 9, 1959.

IN TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER

Scripture: John 1:4–7. In him was life; and the life was the light of men.

And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not.

There was a man sent from God, whose name was John.

The same came for a witness, to bear witness of the Light, that all men through him might believe.

Remarks:

The Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER was my friend and as friends we had things in common. Among the things we held in common were our God and the "human family" to which he consecrated so much of his interest and influence. I would say of Mr. CHRISTOPHER that "he went about doing good and the common people heard him gladly."

When God saw fit to take his devoted wife from this world, Mr. CHRISTOPHER remarked that if God needed her worse than he did, that God was certainly short of help. This remark was not made with any bitterness but in an attitude of appreciation for the years his wife had so tirelessly stood by him as companion—a helpmate ordained of God for GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER—the mother of his children. At a time when the world is in dire need of the counsel of men such as GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, we say in this same attitude—"If God needed him worse than we do, He is certainly short of help."

Prayer:

Omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent God, in this time of sorrow we would thank you for your love, for your mercy, for your presence. We thank you for the life of this one to whom we pay tribute today. We thank you for the footprints he has made on the threshold of this generation. We pray that we might follow these footprints, for we believe them to be just, unselfish, dedicated, consecrated, directing us toward peace in a world where hunger shall be obliterated and where the "human family" he loved will be recognized as "created in the image of God." Raise up another like unto this one whose passing we mourn, that we might have new hope for tomorrow.

Bless these children and their children in this hour of sorrow and loneliness. As you have stilled the stormy tempest, still the tempest within their hearts; be their guiding light.

Finally, God, bless the good earth which he loved as she receives him back into her strong bosom to give him rest from his labors. Hallow this grave till Jesus come, we pray.

J. A. SANDERS.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, my tribute to Mr. CHRISTOPHER is contained in a telegram which I herewith ask to be my remarks:

JANUARY 26, 1959.

The FAMILY OF HON GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

In the loss of your fine and distinguished relative, you have my deepest and sincerest sympathy. He really served well and faithfully his day and generation.

Sincerely,
SAM RAYBURN.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, there are some men with whom we walk who bring challenge, inspiration, understanding, confidence, and pleasure to the association. Such a one was our late and beloved colleague, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. These attributes which have universal appeal he possessed and displayed until the day of his passing.

I was fortunate indeed to have known GEORGE CHRISTOPHER as a personal friend and as a colleague on the committee where I have served since coming to Congress. We came to Congress together with the convening of the 81st Congress. We have conferred together many, many times since the first week of January 1949. Always he brought to the association something of a constructive challenge, a pleasing personality which offered inspiration, an understanding which showed breadth of preparation and great knowledge of the task at hand. Such were his contributions to the task of seeking solutions to difficult problems that he lent confidence in the quest. He was an effective and accomplished protagonist. At the same time he was a respected and admired antagonist.

Above all things, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was endowed with a gentle and lovable personality. His love of his fellow man was expressed in the poetry which he chose to recite to his fellows. The good-natured twinkle in his eyes carried sympathy and love for all who desired to share with him, but more especially for the less fortunate of his fellow beings. To be with him was to find pleasure in his company and companionship. To have known him while he walked and worked among us was to have received an eternal blessing—coming as it were from one of God's own. We shall miss him sorely, but he too has rightfully earned his eternal rest.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret and great shock that I learned of the sudden death of Representative CHRISTOPHER, of Missouri, last Friday evening. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a great and a good Democrat. I hope that I am a good Republican. We often differed in our party positions and our political philosophies, and yet we were good and warm personal friends.

As evidence of the type of man that GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was, may I say that on Friday he called my office several times, while I was tied up in committee, and left word for me to call him. I called him back late on Friday afternoon just a few short hours before I received the news of his sudden passing. He had telephoned me to offer to me, and to the people of my district, and of the State of Ohio, his help and assistance in meeting the great flood tragedy which had struck us on Thursday, and concerning which I had spoken on the floor of the House. His kindly interest and action illustrates the life of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER better than anything I can say here about him. A big and generous man he crossed party lines; and thinking only of the welfare and needs of the people I represent, offered his assistance in committee, and on the floor of the House in any action which might be necessary to give relief to the thousands of homeless in the State of Ohio. This is the way he ended his life, making probably his last telephone call on Capitol Hill to help others before he left for home. His last effort was to be of service to the people of another district and another State.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay my tribute to his memory today, and express the hope that his family may have the help of divine providence in these dark hours of bereavement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN].

Mr. KARSTEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to know and work with GEORGE CHRISTOPHER for many years. His untimely passing is a great personal loss to me.

I recall our first meeting over a decade ago. He introduced himself as a farmer from Butler County, Mo. His sincere friendliness was reflected by the merry twinkle in his eyes, which all of us remember so well. We talked for perhaps an hour or more, and from that day we became close personal friends.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a man of many talents. He had a deep love for nature and the soil and was one of the great leaders of our time in the field of soil conservation. He often said he practiced what he preached, and his beautiful farm in Missouri is a testament to the soundness of his theories. Being close to nature and the soil, he was a deeply religious man—a student of the Gospel and an expert in the Scriptures. His philosophy he drew from the Bible. It was simply, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." He lived every day of his life by the Golden Rule.

His services to his State and the Nation were many and varied. With distinction he first served as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and later on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Perhaps one of his greatest contributons was his ability to help the Members of this House better understand each other's problems. He brought to the House the concept that the problems of the farmer are identical to the problems of the workers in the cities and that by working together we can better solve the problems of both.

Crippling illness forced him to a wheelchair a few years ago. But this did not lessen his activities nor slow down his work. Through the years thousands came to him with their problems. He never turned a single one away. In his home district his name is legend. He faithfully served the people he represented, and they will long remember him not only as an outstanding Congressman but as a personal friend.

To his wonderful family I express my deepest sympathy. We shall all miss GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. But we shall cherish his memory, knowing that our great House of Representatives is better for his having passed through here.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS].

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, may I join with our colleagues from Missouri in expressing the deepest sense of loss in the passing of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. As the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said, his life epitomized the opportunity which has come to Americans in America throughout its whole history.

I was particularly interested in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KARSTEN] had to say about Mr. CHRISTOPHER, because, as he said, his philosophy was an inspiring one. He was always kind and considerate, but in addition to that he was always happy and joyous, which reflected an inner peace and an inner calm which so many of us have failed to achieve in life.

I remember even after his crippling illness, even after he had lost a leg and had to labor thus handicapped, he was always ready to smile, always quick with the lighter side, yet terribly concerned about the problems of people.

I, too, was interested in the fact that the gentleman from Missouri said his approach was not parochial. Despite the fact that he was born and reared on a farm, despite the fact that he had labored so long with his own hands and in the sweat of his own brow on the land, and despite the fact that he had acquired so much of the sun from the skies in his own life, he yet understood the problems of the cities and he was always in the forefront in fighting the battles against the slums as well as the battles for the welfare and happiness of those who live on the farm.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have lost a fine friend, a great legislator, and a fine American. May God bless him and keep him.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CARNAHAN].

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, my friend, neighbor, and my fellow Missourian, was one of the fine men Missouri has given to the Nation. Likened to Will Rogers in humor, storytelling, and love of his fellow men, I will miss this man of great courage and mirth. I am heartened only in the knowledge that the courage of great men outlives them to become the heritage of our people. Such courage lives beyond them and upholds their purposes and helps to bring their hopes to pass.

It was not necessary for GEORGE CHRISTOPHER to suffer pain and handicap himself in order to have a sympathetic heart and understanding for those who are scourged by the ills of misfortune and affliction. These less fortunate groups were represented through the basic principles for which he so steadfastly stood.

I think tenderly of his heroic triumph over disability. He was unwilling to be inactive because in him there was an indomitable spirit, there was moral and intellectual strength which would not permit it.

Following his hospitalization he adopted a motto from Emerson which is indicative of his philosophy as he traveled life's road. It reads:

> The sun shines after every storm; there is a solution for every problem; and the soul's highest duty is to be of good cheer.

The cheer, kindness, and love which GEORGE CHRISTOPHER brought to his friends cannot be replaced.

His character, the richness of his intellect, and his unremitting service to his country will cause his name to be cherished and remembered.

Those who were his opposition, no less than those who were his intimate associates, have always recognized in him a rare crusader for the human race and for his ideals. His absence will be keenly felt by those for whom he so diligently worked—the farmer, the veteran, and the small businessman. His is a great loss to many and one that will not be easily replaced.

Thanks is given for the work and worth of this great man. I have known him and his family personally. I have worked with him, called upon him for valued advice and help in the fields in which he ably qualified, so for me his going is a great personal loss.

To his loving family in Missouri and to his devoted daughter and son-in-law—Monia and Ray Ratliff with whom he resided in Washington, I share your loss and extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues from Missouri, I was deeply shocked Saturday to learn that my good friend, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, had passed on. I was closely associated with GEORGE ever since he first came to the Congress in 1949. Several years ago we served together on the House Committee on Agriculture, and we shared common views on agricultural legislation. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a farmer who lived on the land and loved it. Few men of our day have devoted so much time to the conservation and to the building up of our most important physical inheritance.

I shall miss GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, and, I am sure, this House will miss him. He was one of our most colorful and eloquent Members. Though his rhetoric was homespun, it was always picturesque. He had that rare facility of expression which enabled him to speak graphically and to talk in pictures. More than that, he had a wonderful sense of humor. His keen wit was a ready weapon at all times. I have been with GEORGE in campaigns in his district. His people loved him. They came to hear his colorful stories. He was looked upon as the Will Rogers of the Western Ozarks.

Congressman CHRISTOPHER was a kind and generous person. He was warm and friendly. His life was a blessing to everyone with whom he came in contact. We have lost a great friend and a great legislator. I extend my deepest sympathy to his children.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues from Missouri and the other States in this moment of deep regret at the passing of our great and good friend GEORGE CHRISTOPHER.

GEORGE and I represented adjoining districts. Consequently we were close on a personal basis, on a political basis, and on a legislative basis. I have visited GEORGE at his farm, that wonderful monument to one part of his life's work. I remember him taking me, the city boy, out and showing what he had done to this land that he loved so well; what he had done was obvious even to the most ignorant of city people. He had made the land fruitful, as it should be. What he desired for all people who live on farms was that they would have the opportunity and the ability to see to it that the good earth, given to us by God, would be used as God intended that it should be used.

GEORGE was a man of great good humor. Under most incredible difficulties and hardships GEORGE always had a smile. His determination during the series of very serious illnesses was something wonderful and inspiring to behold. He never lost his courage. He never lost his perspective. He never lost his sense of humor.

In the last primary GEORGE was opposed by forces so strong that very few thought he had a chance of political survival. Then he won—a great victory, a victory which he felt was his greatest political victory. But he held no malice toward those who had opposed him. He was as good humored and kindly in victory as I am sure he would have been in defeat.

We in Missouri and the country generally have lost a great and good friend. It is the country's loss. I think of GEORGE and will think of him always by the name applied to another great political warrior, "The Happy Warrior." He always was a happy, fighting man, who fought for his people; fought for the welfare of all the people. To his loved ones our deepest sympathy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I mourn, with other Members of the House, especially with his people of Missouri and his wonderful family, over the passing of our dear friend, Mr. CHRISTOPHER. I realize how much his fine children must have loved him. One of his fine sons told me of the family unity.

I talked with my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CHRISTOPHER], just before we adjourned. I had the feeling then that he did not expect to return. Not that he would be defeated, but that the good Lord would not let him live so long as that.

I am so glad that he did not know defeat. Courageous, as all of those who have spoken have said, a great lover of his part of the country, yet tolerant for people in other parts of the country, people who lived in the cities. He might criticize them, but underneath he did not dislike them.

I had a chance in the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to know of his tremendous courage, both physical and spiritual. He never took the easy way. It was always the hard way. He fought for his convictions. He fought for those who needed help so terribly in the days gone by, and those who will need help in the days to come.

We will miss him especially on that committee for that reason. He did not need the loss of a limb in order to fight for the disabled with all the strength he had. I can see him now on the floor fighting for them and fighting for the great agricultural part of the country where he lived and for agriculture in general just as hard as he fought before his tragedy—the loss of a limb—overtook him. He took that tragedy with a smile, even joked about it; and yet I think those of us who have seen people who have given so much for their country throughout the years realize what his suffering must have been.

I particularly shall miss him more than I can say because we need him so much in the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. A great warrior, I may say to the able and distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], a great credit to Missouri, a great credit to the United States, a fine Christian gentleman; he will be hard to replace.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Missouri [Mrs. SULLIVAN].

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened by the death of our able and beloved friend and colleague, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, who worked so hard for the people of America, and especially for the farmers of our country. My profound sympathy goes to his family in the loss of a wonderful father.

I believe all of us were struck and impressed by the unfailing good humor, the kindness, the friendliness of this fine man. Adversity never dimmed the warmth of his smile and the genuineness of the affection he held for his many friends.

When Congressman CHRISTOPHER took the floor of the House to discuss important issues of national policy, he enlivened his informative talks with a leavening of humor which reminded us all of Abraham Lincoln, in the ability to illustrate a serious point with an appropriate light touch.

The people of the Fourth District of Missouri have lost an outstanding public servant, a conscientious representative of their interests in the Congress of the United States. All of us in the House of Representatives have lost a friend—and an inspiring personality who believed our laws were intended and should be intended to make this a better country for every individual. It was in that spirit that he served in the House. It was in that spirit that he earned our friendship and admiration.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORRIS].

Mr. MORRIS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was truly a great man. He had a keen and penetrating mind, a big heart, and, until ill health overtook him, a great physique. He was what we usually affectionately referred to as a real dirt farmer Member of this body. He had a profound knowledge of agricultural matters as they applied to the lawmaking phase, and an intimate, expert knowledge, gleaned over a period of years, of the actual operation of agricultural legislation, because he actually tilled the soil. When questions arose concerning bills involving agriculture and I needed advice, I always searched out my friend GEORGE CHRISTOPHER and consulted with him. I found his views to be sound and him to be possessed of unusually good information in regard to this particular subject matter.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that—

The noblest men that live on earth
Are those whose hands are brown with toil;
Who, backed by no ancestral graves,
Hew down the woods and till the soil;
And win thereby a grander name
Than follows kings, or warriors fame.

Our departed beloved colleague contributed greatly to the community in which he lived, to his great State, and to this Nation of ours through his long experience as a tiller of the soil and by reason of his outstanding service here in this House.

May I say in conclusion that, as others have said, he did not confine himself just to agricultural matters alone, but had a deep sympathy and an understanding for all people who labor, as a matter of fact, for humanity generally.

We have lost a sage; we have lost a noble, courageous soul in the passing of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER.

To his loved ones I wish to say, may God comfort you in this, your sad hour.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, today we mourn the passing of a kindly man.

The Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, Representative of the Fourth District of Missouri, was one of the best loved and most respected Members of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we will remember GEORGE as an able and dedicated public servant. We will remember him as a champion of the American farmer, of the American war veteran, and of less fortunate members of American society. But transcending these memories, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER will always present himself to our recollections as a buoyant, cheerful man whose friendliness and good will never deserted him, even in his later days of physical discomfort.

As members of Missouri's congressional delegation, and as Representatives of adjoining districts, GEORGE and I worked closely together and we enjoyed a warm friendship.

I knew him as a man of great ability and of the highest attributes of Christian character. He never passed an opportunity to say a friendly word or extend a helping hand to new or old acquaintances, of high station or low.

He was a great family man and spoke often to his close friends of his fine family of seven sons and two daughters. GEORGE was immensely proud of them and we share with his children their profound sorrow.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a dirt farmer and proud of it. He fought all of his life for proper utilization and protection of our greatest natural resource, our land. He loved our land with the passion of all who have worked it with our hands.

His obituary notice in the Washington Post and Times Herald carried the headline, "Representative CHRISTOPHER, a Missouri Farmer." That is a proud epitaph; GEORGE would have liked it.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I was greatly shocked and saddened when I heard of the untimely passing of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. I extend my sincere sympathy to my colleagues from Missouri in their great loss. I join all of my colleagues in paying tribute to his memory.

I was very fond of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. I cannot imagine anyone who did not like GEORGE. I never met him but what he had a friendly smile and a word of good cheer. No matter what his physical condition may have been, GEORGE was always of the same happy disposition. I was proud to have him as a friend.

I was delighted to see GEORGE looking so well when he returned for the new session of Congress. We had a very pleasant visit when the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee met for the first time. I greatly enjoyed serving on this committee with GEORGE in past years. He seemed to be in the best spirits in greeting his old friends on the committee.

During the last session I was worried over GEORGE in view of his operation and extended illness. When I saw him last week I came to the conclusion that he had recovered his strength and would resume his normal activities in this session of Congress.

The passing of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a great loss not only to his district and the State of Missouri but the entire Nation. He was an independent and fearless Member of this House. We had many friendly visits, and while he was a member of the opposite political party, he was always cooperative and willing to help me on legislation in which I was interested. I shall always be grateful for his friendship and for the splendid support he gave me on many occasions.

I extend my deep personal sympathy to his family in the great loss they have sustained.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, we in southwest Missouri are deeply grieved over the loss of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. For a time he represented many of us in this body. We knew him well, and we liked GEORGE. His passing is cause for genuine mourning.

His family has lost a father and a grandfather.

His neighbors have lost a good neighbor.

We, who were among his many friends, have lost a true friend; and let no one underestimate the Nation's loss.

We have lost a liberal portion of the Nation's common sense, for GEORGE CHRISTOPHER had a liberal portion of common sense. This uncomplicated man had a knack of simplifying the complicated. And he never forgot the folks.

The poor and the underprivileged have lost a portion of the public heart—GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S heart. And, it was big and it was warm.

Yesterday's soldiers have lost a portion of the public respect for yesterday's soldier. Today's soldiers have lost a portion of the public courage.

The plain people, the farmers and laborers, have lost a portion of the public respect for plain people—Farmer GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S respect: Genuine and outspoken.

Christian people have lost a portion of the public faith in religion—Bible quoting GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S faith; absolute and unwavering.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was unschooled but educated. He learned from the world around him, and he wanted others to know that soils are enriched by lime and sweetclover. The world should learn from his life that nations and societies are enriched by GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was one of the first men I met after we were elected to the 81st Congress. Our offices were on the same corridor. We shared so many common interests that we became very close friends. We often exchanged visits and just last week I had a pleasant and fruitful conversation with him in his office. He discussed with me his plans for this session of the Congress. Uppermost in his mind, of course, was the farm program, a subject in which he has always been vitally interested.

GEORGE was always a man of action and he was firmly convinced that the voters had given a mandate to this Congress for action on the farm front.

As a man of action, he also stood in the forefront of those men who fight for principle. There was nothing false about GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. He was a farmer and proud of it. He was a Democrat and proud of it. He was a Missourian and proud of it. He loved his country, its people, and its resources. He was proud of his family and of his farming operation. All of these things made him what he was—a great American.

The farmers of this country have lost a great champion in the continuing fight for equality. His district has lost a devoted servant and an able Representative. His State and country share in this great loss.

To his sons and daughters, we extend our deepest sympathy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS].

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues from Missouri, and others, in paying a brief but sincere tribute to the memory of our departed colleague and friend, Representative GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, of Missouri. He was a fine gentleman, a genuine representative of his people, and a man of great courage both in his own personal life and in his devotion to the public interest. I suppose that GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was the only Member of this House who stood in the breadlines and worked on WPA work crews in the depths of the great depression. He advanced with the advancement of our Nation and contributed to that advancement through his service in the Congress. He always spoke for the things he believed in and was one of the great champions of the cause of the farmer and American agriculture. He was himself a dirt farmer and knew the point of view of the farmer from his own experience. He was a pioneer in agricultural conservation and his own farm was one of the best examples of the application of conservation practices to farming. We all recall his recent affliction and the courage with which he faced it and rose above his physical disability. Both in his private and public life GEORGE CHRISTOPHER will serve as an example that a man of courage, who faces his own and the public's problems boldly, can surmount great odds and serve his Nation ably and with distinction. It is with real sorrow that I join my colleagues in extending an expression of sympathy to his family.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to join my distinguished colleague from Missouri and others in these eulogies to GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. I had the pleasure of knowing him and working with him over a number of years. He was a very sincere, friendly, hardworking, and cooperative person. It was a pleasure to have known him and worked with him. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER and people like him go to make up the representation of our people in this country. I believe Missouri has lost a very sincere and talented Member of Congress. I join in expressing my condolences to the fine family he has left.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ULLMAN].

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a great and wonderful man. Much has been said about his knowledge of agriculture and his contribution to the solution of our agricultural problems. His contributions were indeed great and his knowledge was of significant benefit to the Nation.

However, I should like to talk for a minute about another aspect of his character and another of his deep and abiding interests. It was my privilege, during the 85th Congress, to sit on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with GEORGE CHRISTOPHER and to watch him day after day devoting his time and his energy to the problem of the development of the great natural resources of this country. He believed that these resources should be fully developed and fully utilized for the greatest number of people. He was a great crusader for public power because he believed that public development was the best way to distribute the benefits from the Nation's resources. I want to pay tribute to a great crusader, a great fighter, a wonderful man, who contributed so much to his country. To his family I extend my deepest sympathy.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was my friend. My district parallels his along the Kansas-Missouri line. In three campaigns he advised and counseled me. I probably would not be here today had it not been for his advice and his counsel. The farmer, the laboring man, the housewife and the small businessman have all lost a true friend. I join my colleagues from Missouri in expressing my deep sympathy and that of all Kansas to his family, who have lost a wonderful father; and this Nation has lost a great American.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BROCK].

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of our dear friend and colleague, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, has touched me deeply, and I join with my colleagues in paying respect to his memory. I emphasize the word "friend" because to me he was not only a newly found friend but a learned and valuable adviser in the problems of agriculture.

Like myself, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a dedicated farmer. He was born to the farm and stayed on the farm, as did his family before and after him.

He was an expert on soil conservation and one of the most informed men on farm policy.

As recently as last fall the farmers in my home area of Wakefield, Nebr., had the good fortune to hear him discuss farm problems. They were enlightened and expressed their sincere gratitude for his masterful understanding of this troublesome subject.

The Nation and its agricultural communities have suffered a distinct loss in his passing. His many friends of the Congress and myself have lost the benefit of his sage advice on the agricultural problems confronting the Nation.

I want to extend my heartfelt sympathy to his children in Butler, Mo., and to his daughter and son-in-law in Washington, D.C.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WHITENER].

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, the news on Friday night of the passing of the late Congressman GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, of Missouri, came to me as a particularly hard personal blow. I have lost a close and cherished friend.

When I first arrived in Washington, it was my privilege to be assigned to the office which our late friend had vacated. But I was delighted to learn that he would be across the corridor from me. On each day during our service here, we had the most amiable contact—a contact which has given me an opportunity to know one of the truly great men of this House.

I think it was Congressman CHRISTOPHER'S great love for so many fine things that was the one characteristic which appealed to me so much. It has been well said that he loved the soil. He also loved the wonderful family which was his. In addition, I think that he loved the Members of this House. He loved his country. He had a great appreciation for the opportunity which had been given to him to serve the people of this country. But, I think behind all of that was his great love and appreciation of the Holy Evangel of Almighty God. Almost without exception whenever he came to my office at some point in the conversation he would mention some of the great truths that we find in the Holy Bible.

When I visited him while he was upon the sickbed in the Naval Hospital in Bethesda shortly after he had suffered from the serious surgical operation that had been performed upon him, I was delighted to see that his Christian faith and his Christian courage were shining through just as it had in better days. So it has been throughout my acquaintanceship with him.

I shall miss Congressman CHRISTOPHER, but I will always remember with deep gratitude the many gifts of inspiration which he left for me and for those who were privileged to come in contact with him.

To his colleagues from Missouri, who today feel so keenly his passing, and to the wonderful family of which he was so proud and which he loved so much, I extend the most earnest and sincere condolences of my family in this hour of bereavement.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I join with other friends in expressing my deep sympathy to the family of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER at his untimely passing. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a man we shall miss, and one whose efforts are sorely needed in this hour. Somehow in the years I have served here it looks as if those who retire and those who pass on are those we can least afford to give up.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a great American, a sound American, a man of great capacity, and a man of much intellect. His judgment and his good sense was that type which is sound and which approaches that which we all would seek.

In his life he was a fine example of thoughtfulness for and service to others.

On Saturday I was in the hospital because of a minor ailment. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER had learned of that fact. Early Saturday morning I was grieved to read of his untimely passing. That same day about 12 o'clock I received the nicest kind of message from GEORGE CHRISTOPHER; a "get well; your friends are thinking of you" type of message. I was proud to receive it, and with that thoughtful action he was treating me as we all knew he would, for his heart was with his fellow man.

His confidences were with his God. His interests were in his fellow man; and his efforts for good government for the American people were unsurpassed.

I extend to his friends and his family my heartfelt sympathy in their loss, a real personal loss to me and all who knew him. We would do well to emulate his fine example.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, many outstanding Members have served in this body, but none with more sincerity, loyalty, and devotion to duty than our late beloved colleague, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER.

He was a great public official, truly representative of the heart and soul of America. Throughout his life he was a man of vision, looking forward, and a fighter in the cause of the sick, afflicted, exploited, underprivileged, the toiler on the soil, the worker in the factory and in the offices; a fighter for progress and enlightened democracy.

In this trying period of the world's history he saw clearly the sinister mind and intent and purposes of atheistic communism, and recognized and fought for a powerful national defense, and a strong and firm foreign policy.

As an individual he symbolized everything worth while and uplifting. He was an inspiration for others to follow.

Between us developed a strong friendship. I admired him very much. I valued greatly his friendship. I shall so much miss him.

The people of his district have lost in the Halls of Congress a truly great Representative. The memory of this great man who took his work seriously, but not himself seriously, will long remain in their hearts and minds, as it will with his friends everywhere.

To the members of the Missouri delegation, to the people of his congressional district, and particularly to his sons and daughters I extend my deep sympathy in their great loss and sorrow.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have leave to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound sorrow that I learned of the death of my good friend and colleague from Missouri, the Honorable GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. His untimely passing has taken from our midst a man of ability, a man of high principle and fine moral character, and a fighter.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of serving with Mr. CHRISTOPHER on two committees. Although I often disagreed with the gentleman from Missouri on matters of policy and philosophy, I could never disagree with the way he presented his views, nor could I help but admire his fighting spirit and the strength of his convictions.

I would like at this time to express the sorrow of both Mrs. Weaver and myself at his passing, and extend our condolences to his family.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, a mighty oak fell when our colleague, Mr. CHRISTOPHER died. He fought for his constituents and his country. He asked no quarter and gave none in that struggle. Indeed he was one of God's noblemen. I will miss him so much. My deepest sympathy goes to his family.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, we rightfully pause to pay warm tribute to a departed colleague, GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, able Congressman from the Fourth District of Missouri. The people of Missouri and the Members of Congress are stunned by the passing of this great and humble man who was a devoted public servant and a good friend of mankind.

It was my pleasure and privilege to have been associated with GEORGE CHRISTOPHER in both the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee and the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Those of us who remain to carry on the work will certainly miss his warm sense of humor, his strong personality, his wise counsel, his keen analytical mind and his devotion to duty, but we will continue to be guided by the splendid example set for us by GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. Indeed the world is a better place in which to live because GEORGE CHRISTOPHER has lived and worked among us. It has been said that every great example takes hold of us and says with the authority of a miracle, "If ye had but faith, ye also could do the same things." Whenever we are faced with problems in the future, we shall certainly think of the life and example of our departed colleague, and say, "Follow the lead of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER and you will achieve good works for the good of man."

To his family and his wide circle of friends, I express my heartfelt sympathy in this hour of bereavement.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, as the Representative of the Fourth Congressional District of West Virginia, I rise to pay tribute to the late GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, who has so ably represented the Fourth Congressional District of Missouri.

I first met Mr. CHRISTOPHER not long after he arrived in the House of Representatives with the famous class of 1948 which brought so many able Members here for the first time, including two of Mr. CHRISTOPHER'S Missouri colleagues, Messrs. BOLLING and MOULDER. We talked about many things on this first meeting, and the lasting impression which I received was that here was a man who in the truest sense of the word was "down to earth."

He had a deep sympathy for the farmer, the worker, and the small businessman. I do not think I knew a man who had less social pretense than GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. A true son of the soil, he spoke his mind honestly, directly, and always with the deepest sympathy for the less privileged people.

It was fitting that GEORGE CHRISTOPHER should be President Truman's own Congressman, for Mr. CHRISTOPHER shared President Truman's passionate devotion to the cause of those who deserved a better break in the economic struggle to make a living.

During the New Deal days my uncle, W. Roy Hechler, administered the U.S. crop insurance program in Missouri and was also president of the Missouri Seed Corn Growers Association. In these capacities my uncle used to visit GEORGE CHRISTOPHER at his farm. I heard something of their conversations from both sides, and I got to like the way this Missouri farmer developed his simple philosophy of life.

We could use more men with GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S philosophy.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, the death of GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER marks the passing of a great American, a forceful and sincere legislator and a firm and loyal friend. He personified the attributes of the positive thinking of all Missourians; show me if the facts are there.

His love for the farmer, and his intense interest in the study of farm problems were only equaled by his unswerving loyalty for their welfare. As Congressman of the Fourth District of Missouri, encircling Independence, Mo., he was ever in the forefront advising, sponsoring, and defending the progressive and healthy legislative farm program of his loyal and intimate constituent—the colorful, fiery, forthright, positive, practical thinking, popular, former Democratic President of the United States, Harry S. Truman.

His marked resemblance both in mental attitude and fiery delivery to Mr. Truman was not a coincidence, but a natural circumstance as a result of their sincere down-to-earth philosophy.

He was well informed on many questions in public affairs. His spicy orations and courageous fortitude won him many friends. Always in pain and suffering, he still smiled and carried on.

The great loss of his dear wife several years ago did not embitter him—he loved people. It was an honor for any one of us to serve him in pleasant niceties at times.

He was a brave and lovable character. His seven sons and two daughters idolized him. He was a worthy public servant and sacrificed for others throughout his life.

The good Lord knew of his physical sufferings and yet by force of will he persevered to serve his fellow man. His blessed life spent in toil for his fellow man was God's reward to unite him with his dearly beloved mate. The distinguished Missourians in the Congress have lost a true leader who as an honest fighter, the Congress admired and revered. We extend our heartfelt condolences to his bereaved family. Yes—Missouri and the Nation have lost an American eagle.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, it is with a real sense of personal loss that I join the Members of this House in paying tribute to the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, of the Fourth District of Missouri. Though I knew him but a short time, I counted GEORGE CHRISTOPHER among my true proven friends.

We often refer to someone as being the salt of the earth. This description truly fitted Congressman GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. The originator of the term must have had in mind a person exactly resembling Representative CHRISTOPHER.

Ever ready with a story to lighten the burdens borne by his colleagues, ever ready to lend a helping hand, not waiting to be asked but offering his services, energetic in the cause of his constituents, knowledgeable as to humans, diligent in his duties as a Member of Congress both in committee and at meetings of the House of Representatives, the Honorable GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was outstanding in his service of right and justice as God gave him the light to see it, serving with charity, courage, intelligence, and strength.

To his family, I extend my deepest sympathy and understanding. The inspiration of Congressman GEORGE CHRISTOPHER will remain with me and will continue to encourage all who knew him.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, the sincere and moving tributes that have been paid to GEORGE CHRISTOPHER by so many of his colleagues here today is a better measure of the affection and esteem in which he was held than anything I can say. I do want to add my voice to those who have praised him, however, because I have suffered a great personal loss. We were both members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and sat next to each other in the committee room. For years, I have enjoyed his companionship, have benefited from his wisdom, and profited from his experience.

I shall miss his kindliness and his keen, humorous comments. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a dedicated patriot and a man of character and principle.

In extending my sympathy to his family and friends, I share a part of their loss.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret the death of my friend and colleague, the Honorable GEORGE CHRISTOPHER.

No Member of Congress was more steadfast in his devotion to agriculture and the farmer. He will be especially missed in the struggle that lies ahead to enact effective, permanent farm legislation.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a good man and the members of his family, to whom I offer condolences in this hour of sorrow, can take consolation in the fact that he will not soon be forgotten.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, the heartfelt warmth of those who have spoken in tribute to our friend and late colleague, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, will I hope, bring some comfort to his family in their sorrow.

There were two things for which I shall always remember GEORGE: First, his great and solid belief in fighting for the welfare of the everyday citizen. He never minced any words. He always was concise and clear spoken. He was sharp, but never mean.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, his spiritual and physical courage were an inspiration and a lesson to those who have lesser burdens to bear. I know no way of paying him a greater tribute than just saying that he was a wonderful human being.

I shall miss him. We shall all miss him, and we should pray that we shall have the strength to carry on our duties with some of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S resolute and undying spirit.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, 2 days before the House Veterans' Affairs Committee was scheduled to meet to organize for the 86th Congress our colleague and friend, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, expired.

I speak for the membership of my committee in expressing our deepest sympathy to GEORGE CHRISTOPHER'S friends and family. Their loss is great. We will miss him on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. He brought to the committee a strong feeling of compassion for the human side of our work. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was motivated in his committee work by concern for the individual. He had great sympathy for the problems of those whom we seek to help with veterans' legislation. He has been an active force in many of the most important pieces of legislation coming from the committee in recent years designed to aid disabled veterans and their widows and children.

The veterans in this Nation have lost a real friend in the passing of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of sadness that I learned on Saturday last of the passing of the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER who first became a Member of the House of Representatives in 1948.

It was a great pleasure to have known GEORGE CHRISTOPHER over these years. He was a fine gentleman of sparkling wit and a great asset to his party and his country. He was a faithful and capable Representative of the people of his Congressional District and of the State of Missouri. His sons and daughters have my deepest sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, the sudden and unexpected passing of our colleague and fellow Missourian is distressing to everyone who knew GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. His ever lovable, friendly, and sunny personality made him one of the most popular Members of Congress. He was blessed with a host of friends and his genuine friendship will forever remain in our memories of him as a great man. He was one of our most illustrious Americans. Many people may never realize nor appreciate the full force of the impact that this vision-endowed farmer-statesman has made on the future of our Nation.

On the wall in this Chamber of the House of Representatives, we can see the words of Daniel Webster:

> Let us develop the resources of our land, call forth its powers; build up its institutions, and promote its great interests and see whether we also in our day and generation can promote something worthy to be remembered.

This we know GEORGE CHRISTOPHER has done. His words and advice spoken in debates on the floor of this House were highly respected and will long be remembered.

The magnificent life of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was controlled by the basic philosophies which made him a great man. His was not a complicated nor high-sounding philosophy. He believed in the fundamentals of love and devotion to family, church, State, and country.

He was truly a fine man, an orator, an able scholar, and statesman. GEORGE was truly the salt of the earth. I join with all Members of Congress in extending to his sons and daughters our sincere sympathy.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of personal loss that I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the memory of the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER. We came to the 81st Congress together as freshmen in 1949. He then was 61 with behind him the background of a life, most of which had been spent as a farmer in his native county of Bates in Missouri. He was robust, virile, and dynamic. He spoke frequently from the well of the House in the 81st Congress and on numerous occasions, although he was then a first termer. His manner of presentment, his hitting accurately on the target, and his pungent humor invariably brought down the House and called forth applause in unusual measure. He was not a Member of the 82d and 83d Congresses, but returned to us in the 84th Congress. For me, it was a gladsome reunion, for the rugged honesty and the outspokenness of GEORGE CHRISTOPHER had always endeared him to me. Because of the condition of his health he did not speak as often in the 84th and 85th Congresses as he did in the 81st Congress, but, when he did speak, every Member listened and always he won votes for the cause he was championing.

The last time I remember hearing GEORGE talk was after the amputation of his leg. He was wheeled in on a stretcher, adjusted himself to the microphone, and then, speaking under the disadvantage of his position, made a talk as full of dynamite and as pungent as any I have heard in this House.

He will be greatly missed. In his passing, the Congress of the United States has suffered the loss of one of its Members that it could least afford to lose. My deep sympathy goes to his children, to all of the members of his family, to the district of former President Harry Truman that he so well represented, to the great State of Missouri, and to the Nation of us all.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I feel a deep sense of sorrow at the passing of our colleague, Representative GEORGE CHRISTOPHER, of Missouri.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a very special friend of mine. We came to Congress together, having both been elected for the first time in November of 1948. We thus had the special ties of fellow Members of the freshman class.

A few years ago I had the opportunity of inviting GEORGE CHRISTOPHER to speak before the Men's Club of the Francis Asbury Methodist Church, the church which I attend here in Washington. True to my expectation, he delivered a fine inspirational speech that revealed his depth of character and his understanding of man's spiritual life.

I appreciated the opportunity of serving in Congress with GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. I profited from my association with him. He was a man of the soil, and was proud of it. He loved the soil. He was close to nature and to nature's God.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was a family man. He frequently spoke to me about his wife, and about his children, and about his farm.

A time like this brings fresh meaning to the words of the poet, John Donne, who said: "Any man's death diminishes me." Certainly that is true when the man is your friend, as GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was my friend. In his passing I suffer a deep personal loss.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER loved his fellow man as few men do. In him the farmer, the laborer, the small businessman, the school child had a firm friend.

The Nation will miss him, and generations yet unborn will profit from his service here.

Mrs. PFOST. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to a great and good man, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. His State of Missouri and the Nation have lost an able legislator and dedicated public servant. We who served with him here in the House, and especially those of us who were privileged to serve with him in committee, have lost a trusted friend.

There is one attribute which GEORGE CHRISTOPHER surely possessed above all others; that was his devotion to his principles and his dedication to duty as he saw it. There has never been a greater champion in this House of the rights of the small farmer. A farmer himself, he took part in the debates here with all the dignity and strength so often associated with men who live and work close to nature and with God. In his quiet, unassuming way, he lent wisdom and direction to our many discourses in the House. I remember, many times, when tensions were building up, as they often do in the heat of debate, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER was able to reach out for the inspired word, the soft wit that would relax Members and permit us to proceed with our deliberations in a calmer atmosphere.

In the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs I looked upon GEORGE CHRISTOPHER as one of my strong arms, ever ready to help, always available to be called upon for counsel and for facts to bolster the position which he believed to be right.

Yes; we shall miss GEORGE CHRISTOPHER in the House and he will be missed by the people of his district whom he so ably represented, but we and they will be better because he was here.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER came from a town that is close to the center of our Nation. It is not far from the spot where the trails fanned out, over which the pioneers ventured to open up the West.

He loved the land and he cared for it tenderly, and he was proud of the fulfillment that came at harvest time. And the rhythm of the seasons brought the harmony of nature's art and poetry and music to his heart.

GEORGE was a Missouri farmer, and a good one.

He was blessed with the native wisdom, and wit, and independent spirit that is so true to the American character.

Quiet, but plain spoken, he had the faculty of stripping away all sham and artifice to get at the root of an issue.

As I am a city Democrat, representing an industrial district, I liked to talk with GEORGE and learn the viewpoint of the agricultural Midwest, which is the "seedbed" of so much that is individual and self-reliant in our country's personality.

He was conscientious in representing his constituents, and in going beyond that to serve the Nation's interests. Since coming to Washington as a Member of the 81st Congress, he had served on the House Administration Committee, the Committee on Agriculture, the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, and the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

When Congress adjourned, he went back home to the farm of 975 acres where he and the late Mrs. Christopher lived so many happy and work-filled years building the homestead that made its wholesome contributions to the progress of the Nation.

There he replenished himself in the company of friends and neighbors who, beholden only to themselves and to God, looked themselves straight in the eye, and then made up their minds as free men.

When GEORGE returned to Washington he spoke for them, and we, his colleagues were the beneficiaries of his practical knowledge and his homespun counsel.

Missouri has lost a distinguished son who served his people and his Nation well.

We, his fellow legislators in the U.S. House of Representatives, mourn his passing.

To his sons and daughters we send our sincere sympathy.

We pray that the memories of his kindness to them, and his devotion to our Nation, will comfort them in their bereavement, and inspire them throughout the years ahead.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, all of us were saddened by the passing of that great patriot, GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER. Knowing him was one of the pleasant associations in the Congress. He was a great friend of the veterans, the farmers, and the American who earns his livelihood by honest toil.

Those of us on the Veterans Committee loved and admired GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. We could count on him to do the right thing for our country and those who served our Nation in time of war. As a younger Member, I profited much by the experience, the advice and understanding of Mr. CHRISTOPHER. He understood our agricultural problems as few other contemporary Americans. A successful farmer himself, he devoted a great deal of his time and energy to improving the lot of the farmers.

GEORGE CHRISTOPHER raised a fine, upright family. Mrs. Dorn joins me in my deepest sympathy to them. GEORGE CHRISTOPHER will be greatly missed by those of us who knew and loved him. His great service to our country will always be, to me, an admiring reminiscence.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 134) which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of ten Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as members of the funeral committee the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. CANNON, Mr. KARSTEN, Mr. JONES of Missouri, Mr. CARNAHAN, Mr. BOLLING, Mr. MOULDER, Mr. CURTIS of Missouri, Mrs. SULLIVAN, Mr. HULL, and Mr. BROWN of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the remainder of the resolution.

ADJOURNMENT

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 59 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 27, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Cecil B. de Mille

OF
HON. EDGAR W. HIESTAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, California and the Nation lost a great man last week.

Cecil B. de Mille, first citizen of Hollywood, came west from New York in 1913 to make the first feature-length motion picture. He stayed on to build an industry and a personal reputation that will survive him as long as men seek diversion from the cares of life in the motion picture theater; perhaps longer.

He was a pioneer in practically every phase of his industry, constantly developing, changing, adapting new ideas, many of them his own. But in his personal life he was a traditionalist, clinging to the morality, religion, and ethics taught at his mother's knee.

He once remarked that when he was a boy, there were no motion pictures, and that for entertainment his mother read each evening one chapter from the Old Testament and one from the New. His selection of religious themes for many of his productions reflects this early training. His "King of Kings," produced some 30 years ago, is still showing in far corners of the world. His latest of two "The Ten Commandments," it has been estimated, will play for 50 years.

Although his own success was seldom if ever in doubt, De Mille was never at ease when the industry was in trouble. He gave freely of his wise counsel and often acted as financier to companies suffering the stress of a young and sometimes erratic industry.

Young De Mille ran away from school at 15 and tried to enlist in the Army to fight in the Spanish-American War. In World War I he organized a company of the California Home Guard. During World War II he personally accounted for the sales of millions of dollars' worth of war bonds, and millions more through bond-selling shows utilizing actors and actresses under contract to him.

His concept of patriotism extended beyond service in wartime. He was a leader of public affairs and political thought in peacetime as well. At the height of his career in radio, he was thrown off the air for refusing to pay a $1 union assessment which he found incompatible with his sure sense of freedom. The assessment was to be used by the union to fight right-to-work legislation. De Mille, who favored right-to-work, contended that the involuntary assessment forced him to support a belief contrary to his own. He lost the court battle but fought for the principle for the rest of his life.

Cecil B. de Mille was honored by his contemporaries. Industrial awards, including the coveted Oscar, honorary degrees, and organization and Government awards came his way, justly earned. He received one of the first of nine great living American awards bestowed by the United States Chamber of Commerce in 1957.

I mourn the passing of Cecil B. de Mille. He was a great man.

Tom Kitayama—Union City Councilman

OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most rapidly growing areas in California is southern Alameda County. In the last 5 years three areas have been incorporated into new cities. The last came into being early this month when the people of the Alvarado-Decoto district decided to incorporate into Union City.

Under California State law this can only be done by referendum. The proposition to incorporate Union City carried better than 4 to 1.

At the same election 15 citizens of the area submitted their qualifications to the voters by seeking 5 nonpartisan city council seats. The man who topped the ticket was Tom Kitayama, a 35-year-old prominent nurseryman.

Councilman Kitayama is probably the first northern California Nisei to seek an elective post as city councilman. His election is indicative of the respect with which Californians hold their fellow countrymen of Japanese ancestry.

Kitayama's younger brother, Kee, is the newly elected president of Eden Township Japanese-American Citizens League. Another brother, Ray, is a past president of the Freemont JACL.

The Kitayama brothers operate one of the largest carnation nurseries in the country. Tom is president and coowner of the firm and also director on both the northern California Carnation Growers Association and the American Carnation Society.

Tom is married to the former Hideko Horikawa, both Seattle-born Nisei, and they have four children.

Washington Report

OF

HON. BRUCE ALGER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following, my newsletter of January 24:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas)

The 1960 budget, 1,275 pages, 2 inches thick, more than 4 pounds in weight, lists $77 billion in Federal Government expenditures for fiscal 1960 (July 1959 to July 1960). Comparatively, this is $3.9 billion less than this year, fiscal 1959. Receipts will be an estimated $77.1 billion, which is $9.1 billion more than this year. (However, total expenditures to the public are listed as $92.9 billion and total receipts $93.5 billion as distinguished from budgetary.) The President's 78-page budget message, a condensed explanation, discussed expenditures and receipts by Government departments, by military and civilian, and by specific legislative program.

Commendable, as I see it, are these thoughts: (1) We must have a balanced budget, live within our means, pay as we go; we must foster initiative and free enterprise, a sound economy and currency; (2) we need to review existing programs; (3) Congress, not the administration, is constitutionally responsible for the appropriation of money, and the size of the budget results from earlier congressional legislation; (4) Federal programs, wherever possible, should be shifted back to the States (along with tax jurisdiction); (5) we must assure maximum defense for each dollar spent; (6) research in many fields, particularly military, is continually being increased; (7) a better agricultural program is needed with less cost to the taxpayer and less control of the farmer; (8) Government whenever possible should sell surplus property; (9) more user charges and less subsidies are needed so that users, not the general public, foot the bill; (10) private financing, not Government loans, should be stimulated, through flexible interest rates.

Criticisms include: (1) Is a budget balanced and the Federal Government controlled when projects are deferred, rather than canceled; when 43,000 new employees are to be hired; when more money is to be spent in aid to education, vocational rehabilitation, public works, urban renewal, public housing, and almost every welfare program? (2) since 1955 the budget has grown two to one in welfare over defense needs, when we know military requirements are paramount; simultaneously politicians assure us budget growth results from defense requirements; (3) increased population (as reason for budget growth) puts more strain on local government (utilities, schools, etc.) than on Federal Government; (4) Congress is offered additional opportunities to lose control. Example: (a) Foreign aid development loan fund is a revolving fund outside Congress' direct control; (b) other revolving funds are proposed; (c) item veto would transfer to the President great new authority; (d) foreign aid and Public Law 480 (Food Disposal Act) each transfer jurisdiction to the President; (e) requested presidential blanket emergency funds take the purse strings from Congress. (5) The foot-in-the-door programs where great spending increases follow program inception include: (a) Defense education bill; (b) public assistance under social security; (c) urban renewal; (d) world loans through various international banks; (e) many others; (6) the Federal Government intends to foster local initiative by offering more Federal money and control; (7) built-in growth factors and fixed costs are skyrocketing costs without new programs. (Example: Public works will be at an alltime high without even adding any new projects.) (8) Tax incentives to encourage private investment abroad—isn't this tax bribery? Will this weaken investment at home as greater gains can be had in other countries? Is this fair or constitutional? (9) Non-service-connected disabilities of veterans are soaring.

The big question really seems to be, Has the budget gotten beyond all control? After all, it is almost $8 billion higher than the $70 billion budget of 2 years ago that precipitated a nationwide furor. And why the increase? Perhaps Budget Director Stans said it best—"Why is it that some business leaders join taxpayers' organizations to bring pressure on the Government to cut expenses, yet support industry groups seeking more Government subsidies? Why is it that some labor leaders press hard for wage increases to keep up with the cost of living, and then urge a massive program of legislative action which, if adopted, would lead to more deficit spending, higher taxes, and inflation—all of which could only demoralize the value of wages earned?"

Now the battle of the budget begins politically. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.) Mr. CANNON, of Missouri, Appropriations Committee chairman, said, "All fiscal recommendations start with the President. Congress does not make the budget—he is at complete liberty to recommend a cut of $5, $10, $15, or $20 billion." Mr. JENSEN, of Iowa, said, "The President cannot spend 1 penny which the Congress does not appropriate. We all know that." Mr. HALLECK, of Indiana, said, "The chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations referred to the increase from $65 billion to $79 billion over the past 4 years. During those 4 years he has been chairman of that committee, and Congress holds the purse strings over expenditures." So it goes—expenditures are voted by Congress, Democrat controlled, whose leaders now try to shift the blame to the President, who can only administer the law, which Congress passes. "The President proposes, but Congress disposes." We here know this, yet it is the people who are to be hoodwinked. True, the President could be a more forceful leader, but liberal Democrat spending critics offer only, "We must spend more." (First day of Congress, six Democrats put in bills with a 5-year price tag of $117 billion.)

Why not review all existing programs, as the President suggested we do in the military, to be sure we get maximum value received for each dollar spent in the Federal Government? For maximum value in the military, let's get the Defense Department out of business operations. Why not apply evaluation yardsticks to every Government program now? (1) Is this a function of Federal Government? (2) Can we afford it?

Mikoyan and Russian propaganda experts will now demonstrate over and over the reason for his visit and the gullibility of American people. Mikoyan will speak for American people as set apart and opposed to their Government. Let's review a few Russian comments. Khrushchev called Mikoyan to his face a professional traitor. Khrushchev, speaking of the United States and Russia, "We cannot coexist externally. One of us must go to his grave. We must push them to their graves." Khrushchev again, "We Bolsheviks are a ravenous people. What we achieved in the past is very little" (enslavement of half the world). "We want more and more." On Manuilsky, Russian instructor of political warfare, "War to the hilt between communism and capitalism is inevitable. To win we shall need the element of surprise. The bourgeoisie will have to be put to sleep, so we shall begin by launching the most spectacular peace movement on record. There will be electrifying overtures and unheard-of concessions. The capitalist countries, stupid and decadent, will rejoice to cooperate in their own destruction. They will leap at another chance to be friends. As soon as their guard is down, we shall smash them with our clenched fists." Need more be said?

Legislative Proposals

OF

HON. BASIL L. WHITENER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I have today offered seven bills for consideration by the House of Representatives. These bills, in my judgment, should be promptly considered by the appropriate committees and reported out for final approval at the earliest possible date.

The legislative proposals which I am making may be briefly summarized as follows:

I. EXCISE TAX REPEAL

One of the bills provides for the repeal of the excise tax on communication services and facilities, and another provides for the repeal of such taxes upon the transportation of persons.

Further collection of these excise taxes seems to me to be unwarranted in view of the fact that they were originally imposed as wartime tax-raising devices. These taxes constitute an undue burden upon individuals of small businesses. Repeal would result in very little loss of revenue to the Government and would serve as a stimulus to small business and individual savings.

In the 85th Congress we repealed the excise tax upon the transportation of property, and it now seems highly proper that we should do the same with reference to transportation tax upon persons.

II. ADDITIONAL INCOME TAX DEDUCTIONS AND EXEMPTIONS

One of the bills which I have offered will increase the amount which a taxpayer may deduct on account of expenses paid for the care of his or her dependents who are under the age of 16 years. The other measure would increase from $600 to $1,000 the personal income tax exemption of a taxpayer, including the exemption for a spouse, the exemption for a dependent, and the additional exemptions for old age or blindness.

The working mothers in our country are being heavily penalized under the present Internal Revenue Code by reason of their inability to deduct the costs of care for dependents while the mother is necessarily working to earn a livelihood for her family. To fail to give the consideration which this bill offers for taxpayers who must pay for the care of their dependents while gaining their livelihood will constitute the compounding of a wrong which has long been experienced by the working mothers of our country. I believe that this legislation is long overdue and entertain the hope that others in the House will concur with that thought.

An increase in the personal tax exemption for taxpayers from $600 to $1,000 will give tax relief to the lower income citizens and, thereby, should have a great stimulus upon business as well as personal savings by those in the lower income brackets. The increase in personal exemption which is envisioned will result in very little overall loss of revenue to the Federal Government and could, in the long pull, result in an increase in the revenue by reason of the stimulation which it will give to business.

III. SOCIAL SECURITY

Another bill which I am offering will amend title II of the Social Security Act by removing the limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits thereunder.

This legislation is made essential by reason of the inflationary spiral in which those who are receiving benefits find themselves. Those recipients who are physically able to carry on gainful employment should not be penalized for their diligence and energy, but rather should be encouraged to continue to make their contribution to the business, economic, and industrial life of their country.

Those who have attained all eligibility requirements except the reduction of their own income should not be penalized but should be given the encouragement which this legislation proposes.

IV. WORLD WAR II AND KOREAN WIDOWS AND ORPHANS

Another bill that I am offering today provides that pensions for non-service-connected death shall be extended to the widows and children of deceased World War II and Korean veterans under the same conditions as apply to the widows and children of deceased World War I veterans. This legislation, if enacted, will meet one of the real needs in the field of veterans' affairs in this country. Since 1934 the provision has been made for widows and children of deceased World War I veterans in the manner now sought to be extended to widows and orphans of deceased World War II and Korean veterans. Certainly it can be said that these individuals should receive the same consideration as now extended to those similarly situated by reason of casualties of World War I.

This legislation will mean a great deal to many needy and worthwhile widows and children in this land of ours.

V. SENATE AND HOUSE PAGES

I am also offering a bill to provide a residence for pages of the Senate and of the House of Representatives under the supervision of a Capitol Pages' Residence Board.

It has alarmed most Members of Congress that young boys are being brought from their homes throughout the country to Washington to serve as pages in the two bodies of Congress without having any provision made for their supervision and housing upon their arrival in the Nation's Capital.

This is a situation which should not be permitted to exist beyond the current session of the United States Congress.

To establish a pages' residence would not require any tremendous appropriation, particularly in view of the fact that it is contemplated that the pages will pay such rates and fees, as far as practicable, as are sufficient to make the operation and maintenance of the residence self-sustaining.

This residence idea is not a new one. It has been discussed with and by many of my colleagues, and it seems to be uniformly agreed that something should be done immediately to eliminate the failure of supervision which we now observe in the handling of housing arrangements for our splendid young boys.

Mr. Speaker, I again reiterate that I entertain the hope that the legislative proposals which I am today making will be seriously and promptly considered by the House of Representatives through the appropriate committees and that action may be taken upon them with the greatest possible dispatch.

Tribute to Representative Herman P. Eberharter

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, may I also join my colleagues from Pennsylvania, and other Members, in paying a brief tribute to the memory of the Honorable Herman P. Eberharter. He was a great Democrat and a most able representative of the people of his district and his State. He possessed a wonderful personality and served with great distinction as a member of the Ways and Means Committee. We miss him and will continue to miss him.

May I extend an expresion of my sincere sympathy to the members of his family.

OF

HON. E. Y. BERRY

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose today to bring before the Congress one of the most vexing problems confronting the Indian people of South Dakota, confronting the counties and the State of South Dakota.

The problem results from a policy of the Indian Department established at the Washington level, that when an Indian has been away from a reservation for 1 year, the Department is no longer responsible for him or his family, either for medical care, for relief, or any other benefits intended by Congress for the Indian people, including such benefits as trades training, on-the-job training, educational loans, and so forth.

These latter programs, however, do not cause too great disruption between Federal and local governments, they have only a detrimental effect upon the welfare of the individual Indian.

One of the serious problems, however, arises from the fact that most States, including the State of South Dakota, have a statute providing that an indigent person or an indigent family moving from one county to another may not become a resident of the new county, and, therefore, become a county ward or a financial burden upon that new county, if the new county into which the individual or the family moves, does, within a certain time, serve upon him a notice to prevent acquiring a legal settlement.

Such notice in South Dakota provides that the individual coming into such county from another county or another State who is likely to become a public charge, is thereby warned to depart therefrom, and that service of such notice shall apply to all members of such family.

Through the years, the law has been upheld and interpreted many times by the Supreme Court. Families have been returned to their original county several years after leaving that county, if they should attempt to become a public charge upon the new county.

The Indian Department, however, refuses to recognize the laws of the State of South Dakota. When an Indian has been off of the reservation for a year, the Department washes its hands of him, regardless of whether the county into which he has moved serves a notice to prevent acquiring legal settlement or not. Public Health follows the policy of the Indian Department. The result is that counties in South Dakota located near Indian reservations, where Indian people congregate for employment, find themselves in an unbearable position, with the Indian Department refusing assistance and the country unable to provide the assistance. The Indian finds himself caught in the bind.

One serious example is the hospitals in Rapid City, S. Dak., where many thousands of dollars of hospital bills each year go unpaid by either the county or the Federal Government. Indian people are brought to the hospital in serious condition, an emergency exists and they must be given treatment. Because the Indian is indigent and unable to pay, the hospital is required to carry the cost of treatment and hospitalization.

I would quote from a letter under date of January 19, 1959, from the St. John's McNamara Hospital of Rapid City, S. Dak., with regard to the hospital bill of one Bert Guy Eagle Horse, age 41, an indigent taken to that hospital for emergency treatment and hospitalization. Part of the letter follows:

> He was found lying in the street, a tire iron lying nearby and with severe lacerations about the head. A severe blow across the base of the man's head caused a state of unconsciousness requiring immediate attention. I called Dr. Sicher, the Indian public health physician, at the clinic in the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak., for authorization. This was refused. I explained that he had authorized treatment for the man for rattlesnake bite at a previous admittance, August 1, 1958, and that they had recognized him as being eligible for authorization. He advised me that this was true, but that he had discovered that this was a mistake and that he should not have given it.

When the hospital called Pennington County Welfare Office they were advised that Bert Guy Eagle Horse was not a resident of Pennington County and apparently was prevented from becoming a resident, because of the South Dakota law. The county in which the home reservation of Bert Guy Eagle Horse is located will, of course, not pay the bill.

This, Mr. Speaker, creates a no man's land with the individual Indian and the hospital caught in the bind. The Congress appropriates millions of dollars annually in the belief that the Indian people are being cared for. The fact is, the policy of the Indian Department makes of these people, who are encouraged by the Department to leave the reservation, a man without a country and ineligible for any assistance. This, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, is a field in which the Congress must act. It is unfair to the Indian people that a vacuum should exist in which these people now find themselves at the mercy of non-Indian hospitals located adjacent to an Indian reservation.

We are advised that the Public Health hospitals on the reservation will give service to Indian people regardless of the fact that they have left the reservation for a time, but there is no provision for their return and no provision for emergency treatment. Worse than that, there is no provision for any public assistance to these families who having been encouraged to leave the reservation in search of work and to integrate into the white society, then find themselves destitute in a county which has served legal notice upon them to prevent their acquiring a legal settlement.

In the Quality and Integrity of Our Young People Lies the Strength and Future of America

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER
OF KENTUCKY
Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, each year the Kentucky Junior Chamber of Commerce names its three outstanding young men and an outstanding young farmer of the year. On January 20 the selections for 1958 were made and it was with a great deal of gratification and pride that I learned that two of the four young men chosen for this distinguished honor are from the Second Congressional District of Kentucky which I have the honor to represent.

Thomas B. Hagerman, selected by the Kentucky Junior Chamber of Commerce as one of its three outstanding young men, is a native of Bowling Green, my hometown in Warren County. And William T. Roark, chosen as the outstanding young farmer, is from Franklin, Simpson County. These two men exemplify, in the truest sense, the tradition of selfless service to community and fellow citizens which has played such an important part in the growth of Kentucky and this great country of ours.

The choice of Thomas B. Hagerman is quite appropriate as the variety of activities in which he participates with excellence makes him indeed worthy of the appellation "outstanding." As an agent for Aetna Oil Co., in Bowling Green, Mr. Hagerman gives freely of his time, energy, and leadership to the various groups whose common denominator is the betterment of the community and the instilling of worthy ideals of service and integrity in the youth of that community. In these troubled times when the newspaper headlines scream of juvenile crimes, I would like to take this opportunity to express my personal appreciation for young men such as Thomas B. Hagerman. I can think of no better way to inspire the youth of our Nation with the ideal of service to their fellow man than by example. The emulation of men such as Thomas Hagerman cannot help but produce finer citizens of tomorrow.

Mr. Hagerman, who graduated from Western Kentucky State College, is a Jaycee, is active in church work, is a coach of the Small Fry Football Conference, a member of the Two Gallon Blood Donor Club, is a Warren County jury commissioner, a veteran participating in the Army Reserve program, and a high-school football official. The scope of his interests ranging from church work, youth direction, service to community as a jury commissioner, to Army Reserve activities indicates the fullness and maturity of character possessed by Mr. Hagerman.

As service to community enhances the facilities of our urban centers, so excellence in farming contributes to the productivity of our rural areas upon which this Nation was built. It is to men such as William T. Roark that we can look with pride and confidence to the further development of agriculture. During the past 11 years in which Mr. Roark has engaged in farming, he has increased the productivity of his 985-acre farm by 166 percent. He raises beef cattle and seed. In addition to his truly outstanding farmwork, young Roark is active in his church, the Rotary Club, Kentucky Chamber of Commerce, Masons, soil-conservation work, county extension council, Simpson County Farm Bureau, and Simpson County Tobacco Association. When so many of our young men are leaving the land with the idea of quick success in the city, the example set by William T. Roark should serve as an inspiration to the youth who elect to remain on the farm and achieve a full and satisfying life in agricultural pursuits.

I am justifiably proud in being able to place in the RECORD a brief tribute to the accomplishments of these two fine young men from the Second Congressional District of Kentucky. In the quality and integrity of our young people lies the strength and future of America and certainly Thomas B. Hagerman and William T. Roark are worthy of the trust placed in them.

Justice for Hawaii

OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in my extension of remarks, I include a statement made by me before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in support of the admission of Hawaii as a State of the Union.

The statement follows:

JUSTICE FOR HAWAII

Mr. Chairman: In the last Congress, Alaska came of age; it is now long past the hour to end Hawaii's apprenticeship. It is an indisputable fact, that Hawaii met the traditional threefold test of eligibility for statehood.

Before analyzing Hawaii's eligibility, permit me to remind my colleagues of the three basic requirements demanded by tradition and precedent for admission. First, the people of the Territory must evince love for the ideals of American democratic government. Second, a majority of the electorate must express a clear desire for statehood. And third, the Territory must possess sufficient resources and population to support the cost of State government. I shall demonstrate that Hawaii has passed these tests with high honors.

The Hawaiian people have been drawn to America almost from the very dawn of their modern history. In 1820, 17 New England missionaries arrived in the archipelago; and before the passage of many years the natives in large measure were converted to Christianity and made familiar with the ways of the West. White whalers, traders, speculators, and sugar planters migrated to the islands in progressively greater numbers.

By 1842, five out of six ships calling at Hawaii were American; and Yankee cultural influence, despite strong British competition, rapidly assumed predominance. In 1842 a constitution modeled in part after that of the United States was adopted. Fourteen years later the people of this constitutional monarchy urged their King to negotiate for annexation to the United States. He complied, but the project was abandoned with his untimely death.

In 1893 Hawaii became a Republic, and negotiations for annexation were immediately undertaken. A treaty linking the two Republics was soon fashioned, but it was withdrawn from the American Senate by President Cleveland, who had not been in office when the Hawaiian revolution erupted and who disapproved of what he considered the unseemly haste by which the annexation convention had been drafted.

Four years later a new treaty of annexation was signed, but it, too, failed of ratification. Finally, sponsors of the treaty abandoned it in favor of submitting to Congress a joint resolution of annexation, the passage of which required only a simple majority vote. The resolution was approved, and President McKinley signed it on July 7, 1898. Two years later, on April 30, 1900, the Organic Act for Hawaii was approved (to take effect June 14, 1900), and Hawaii thereby became an incorporated Territory.

Since 1903 the Hawaiian Legislature has petitioned Congress for statehood nearly a score of times; and from 1920 to the present time, approximately 50 bills providing for statehood have been introduced in successive Congresses. In 1947 substantive, if incomplete, action was finally taken. On June 30 of that year the House passed the statehood bill, but it died in the Senate. The same melancholy story was repeated on March 7, 1950, and March 10, 1953.

In 1954 the Senate saw fit to combine the Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood bills, and on April 1 of that year approved the dual measure. There are some who still maintain that passage was obtained only because assurance had been given the antistatehood bloc that the House would reject the joint bill, despite the fact that House support for Hawaiian admission alone was overwhelming. Whatever the reason, the prophets of disaster were vindicated.

In 1955, during the succeeding Congress, another dual bill was introduced, this time in the House. On May 10 of that year it was recommitted. This year there is before us only the single Hawaiian bill; let us pray that it will meet with a deservedly kinder fate.

Let us turn now from the representatives of the people in both Hawaii and the United States to the respective peoples themselves. In a 1940 plebiscite, the Hawaiian people voted 2 to 1 for statehood. A decade later they approved the proposed State constitution by more than a 3-to-1 majority. As for the views of mainland Americans (incidentally, the Hawaiians, of course, are just as much American as you and I), Dr. George Gallup has found that a decisive majority has supported statehood ever since pre-World War II days. More recently, the ratio of approval has jumped from 3 to 1 in 1946 to 8 to 1 in August of 1958.

We know that Hawaiians and their compatriots in the States want statehood. But are we sure that the islanders are loyal enough and Americanized enough to deserve such status? I say that the question was answered affirmatively long ago, and particularly so during World War II and its aftermath.

Immediately after the infamous assault on Pearl Harbor, rumors were rife, especially in the States, that Americans of Japanese ancestry engaged in the most heinous sabotage, even designating targets for the attacking planes. Mr. Robert L. Shivers, former special agent in charge of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Honolulu from 1939 to 1943, gave the lie to such calumnies. He testified that all those rumors were false * * * and that sabotage and fifth-column activity was never engaged in at any time prior, during, or subsequent to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Perhaps even more eloquently expressive of Japanese loyalty was the story of the 452d Combat Team and the 100th Battalion. The combined record of these units is probably the most remarkable one in all American military annals. Approximately 10,000 men, most of whom were Japanese from Hawaii, saw action in Europe with the famed outfits. Of these, 4,500 received Purple Hearts. The quantity, as well as quality, of other awards is equally impressive, particularly the 353 Silver Stars and 112 Army and division commendations. Crowning their glory was the fact that not a single one of these boys displayed the slightest cowardice. It's true that three of them went a.w.o.l.—from their hospital beds back to their foxholes.

The unmatched record of the Hawaiian soldier remained untarnished throughout the Korean conflict. Not a single case of cowardice or defection to the enemy was recorded. The battle-casualty rate for Hawaiians was three times as great as the rate per capita for stateside contingents.

One might well ask, in connection with statehood: So what? No one questions that the Hawaiians were brave, but does courage alone entitle a people to statehood? No, it doesn't; but it does prove that those "go for broke" Americans loved their country with an awesome passion. And certainly patriotism must constitute an integral part of any legitimate concept of Americanism.

Other manifestations of similarity with things American are widely prevalent. Despite the oriental heritage of large segments of its population, Hawaii's culture, for the most part, is American. And Hawaiians, regardless of ancestry, look to the West for guidance and emulation. Whether it be business, education, sports, politics, or mores, the pattern is always, and unmistakably, American.

Further evidence of the deep-seated Americanism of all Hawaiians—not merely the Japanese—lies in their chilly reception of the Commonwealth idea. They refuse to trade what they consider their birthright for tax exemption. In other words, they insist on being recognized as first-class Americans, and demand the right to assume all the obligations that such a cherished condition would entail.

The Hawaiian people, I'm sure, are also aware that the imposition of Commonwealth status would, in all probability, be unconstitutional. In Downes v. Bidwell the Supreme Court of the United States declared that "where the Constitution has been once formally extended [in all its parts, both fundamental and formal] by Congress to Territories neither Congress nor the Territorial legislature can enact laws inconsistent therewith." Mr. Justice Brown, in Rassmussen v. United States, another of the famous insular cases, asserted that "the exten[sion of] the provisions of the Constitution * * * once done, is irrevocable." It follows, then, that those who would remake Hawaii in the image of Puerto Rico are at least disingenuous when they extol the benefits Puerto Ricans derive from Federal tax exemptions. As an incorporated Territory, Hawaii is subject to section 8 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides, in part, that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It is doubtful, to say the least, that Congress has the power, under the Constitution, to exempt the citizens of Hawaii from the applicability of this uniformity clause.

It might well be, too, that the Hawaiian people are cognizant that the promise of statehood—at least by implication—was tendered them long ago. Of the 31 incorporated Territories in our history, all but Hawaii have graduated to statehood. From a legal, or constitutional, standpoint, Hawaii is no different from its more successful predecessors. The Federal courts repeatedly have said that incorporation leads to statehood. In 1883 an incorporated Territory was defined in Ex parte Morgan as an inchoate state. About 40 years later, in Balsee v. People of Porto Rico, among many similar cases, the Supreme Court asserted that "incorporation has always been a step, and an important one, leading to statehood." Admittedly, the Organic Act establishing the Territory of Hawaii did not explicitly promise statehood; yet it must at the same time be conceded that precedent and judicial opinion, whether dicta or not, alike have considered Territories as destined for statehood after a reasonable period of tutelage. It would seem that 59 years is long enough.

It behooves us to heed the Hawaiian argument that statehood for the other 30 incorporated Territories has never resulted in failure. Almost without exception, those Territories experienced an immediate and marked expansion in population and in agricultural or industrial development following their admission into the Union. Above all, the people of those new States demonstrated that when they were their own masters, progress recognized no shackles.

The third requirement for statehood—the ability to pay for statehood—poses no problem for Hawaii. The islands constitute, in terms of financial solvency, the richest Territory ever to knock on the statehood door. The gross Territorial product of Hawaii for 1957 was about $1¼ billion, a figure twice as large as that of any other State at the time of its admission. In 1956 the per capita income exceeded that of 26 States, while the per capita tax burden was higher than that of 33 States.

Hawaii's population, estimated in 1958 to total 569,504, is larger than that of any 1 of 5 States, and is more than twice that of Alaska. It is also larger than that of any State at the time of admission except Oklahoma.

Now that it has been established that Hawaii merits statehood, it is in order to examine the principal benefits that would accrue to the people of Hawaii under statehood. They may be listed as follows—and no rights were ever more precious: (1) The right to full voting representation in both Houses of the U.S. Congress; (2) the right to vote for the President and Vice President; (3) the right to choose their own Governor and to carry on functions of government by their own elected officials instead of by Federal administrators; (4) the right to determine the extent of the powers of their own legislature; (5) the right to have their judges locally selected rather than federally appointed; (6) the right to have Federal and local jurisdictions clearly defined and separate; (7) the right to a voice in any proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution; and (8) the right to help write the Federal taxes. Can any reasonable person deny that these rights are basic to the American way of life; or that so long as they are withheld, no citizenship can be first class?

Benefits to the Nation as a whole would also be substantial. Among these would be (1) enhancement of national security; (2) favorable psychological effect on the peoples of the Pacific Basin, and (3) inspiration to racial harmony on the mainland.

The strategic importance of Hawaii is obvious, especially so now that our Pacific military commands have been enlarged and moved to Oahu. Headquarters for the commanding general, U.S. Army Forces Pacific, are at Fort Shafter, in Honolulu.

Statehood opponents concede that Hawaii is strategically vital, but they profess to see no relevancy between military considerations and the statehood issue: Statehood, they argue, would have no effect one way or the other on our defense posture in the Pacific. Apparently they are all materialists; things of the spirit escape them. I say to them that the greater stability afforded local government and the greater popular pride in full citizenship under statehood would enable the Armed Forces to be supported materially in time of war more effectively from the twin standpoints of local economic assistance and local civilian cooperation. And the will of the people themselves to fight, should total war ever become our lot, would be immeasurably strengthened were they called upon to defend their own State—and not a colony.

I reply to the isolationists and the racists who sneer at world opinion and deny any need to impress the East with such a meaningful demonstration of the dynamism of democracy as the elevation of Hawaii to statehood would present, with the observation that the American people have indicated that in these parlous days it's a pretty good idea to miss no bets in the pursuit of friends.

Hawaii justifiably has been called the melting pot that melts. Although its people comprise diverse blood strains, the Territory has a unique record for interracial harmony and cooperation. With the closer association between the islands and the mainland which would accrue from statehood, continental Americans would become more acutely aware of the degree to which democracy is practiced in Hawaii. The example assuredly would have a salutary effect on race relations throughout the States.

The reasons for statehood as outlined above surely dwarf the importance of the opposition's arguments. Chief among these are the alleged dominance of communism in Hawaii, and the disproportionately large representation that Hawaii would enjoy in the Senate of the United States.

The communism scare is strictly a phony. The constitution of Hawaii, which the people themselves drafted a decade ago, disqualifies Communists from holding any public office. And dock strikes, which formerly were both embarrassing and damaging, have been rendered impotent by the enactment of a law enabling the Territory to seize and work the docks.

As for disproportionate representation, that question was resolved, legally and constitutionally, in the Connecticut Compromise of the Federal Convention of 1787.

Hawaii has met all the arguments, and they are hers.

I strongly urge the committee to act favorably on legislation to admit Hawaii as a State of the Union. I shall program the bill after it is reported for as early consideration by the House as is possible.

Tribute to Representative J. Harry McGregor

OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS
OF TENNESSEE
Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues from Ohio, and others, in paying a brief tribute to the memory of our late friend, Representative J. Harry McGregor, of Ohio, whose sudden and untimely passing during the recess of the Congress came as a great shock to his many friends in this Chamber and throughout the country. He was a friendly and most personable Member who represented the people of his district and State most ably.

May I extend my sincere sympathy to the members of his family.

Seventy-sixth Anniversary of the Civil Service Act

OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, my good friend and a tireless champion of Federal employees, the senior Senator from South Carolina, made the principal address at a banquet on January 17, 1959, celebrating the 76th anniversary of the Civil Service Act.

The American Federation of Government Employees sponsored the banquet under the sage and mature leadership of Mr. James Campbell, its national president. Toastmaster for the occasion was the genial and witty Thomas Walters, operations director of the Government Employees Council.

There were many dignitaries present including the Honorable Arthur Fleming, Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and the Honorable Barbara Gunderson, member of the Civil Service Commission. General Melvin Maas, a former member of this body and a distinguished member of the Marine Corps whose work among the handicapped is well known, was present as Chairman of the President's Committee To Employ the Physically Handicapped.

Senator JOHNSTON delivered a stirring address in which he pointed that the vitality of the Nation depends in great measure on the strength of our Federal civil service.

I am honored and privileged to make his remarks a part of this RECORD:

SPEECH BY SENATOR OLIN D. JOHNSTON, DEMOCRAT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA, BEFORE THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AT THE 76TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT

President Campbell, Secretary-Treasurer Johnson, Secretary Flemming, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, I am delighted to join with you in observance of the 76th birthday of the Civil Service Act. I always look forward to and enjoy these meetings with you my fellow workers in the Federal service. Meetings of this kind are richly rewarding. They give us a chance to exchange ideas and to develop new ones.

New ideas and fresh thinking are needed today. We cannot afford to become sterile or stale in our thinking or in the way in which we act.

Our way of life depends on our national strength and vitality.

The vitality of the Federal civil service will remain strong in the future on a balanced diet of improved public opinion, purpose and progress.

I long have held to the belief that our civil service has been the victim of undeserved bad publicity. It has been the victim of an unfortunate lack of understanding by the public of what it is and of what it does. If the man in the street knew it as we do, there would be no need to concern ourselves with the problem of public opinion.

Unfortunately, that is not the case today. Neither will it be tomorrow unless positive steps are taken to bring it about. As for my part, I propose to do all in my power to help mold a better and more realistic public opinion of the Federal service.

You, here tonight—the organization to which you belong—others like you—should consolidate your efforts on ways and means of acquainting the public with the virtues and accomplishments of our Federal service and our civil service system.

I doubt that the public gives proper credit to our civil service. It contributes so much to making this Nation strong and great.

How many know that much of our once fertile land is tillable today only because of farsighted and well-executed programs of conservation conducted on a national basis.

Is the public aware that our rivers have been harnessed bringing floodwaters under control; that our forests have been created, extended, and improved; that game and fish have not been allowed to become extinct as the result of national planning and programs.

Does the public know that the foods we eat are clean and pure; that the medicines we take are safe and up to standard; that the cosmetics we use are free of harmful ingredients because of federally administered programs.

Does the public realize that our progress in providing a network of better roads; faster and safer transportation by land, air, and water; more effective prevention and cure of disease; maximum safety of bank savings; old age and disability benefits; greater protection to the honest and innocent against crime and fraud; and, improved communications result from Government interest in and attention to our national social problems.

Even if the public had such an awareness—and I think we can agree that it doesn't—there would still be the problem of getting across effectively that each of these varied and complex programs are only as good as the people who carry them out.

The mere recognition and identification of a national problem of itself does not provide a solution. That is only the first step.

Enactment of legislation—no matter how well concerned and designed—does not assure solution. That is merely a second step.

The most important ingredient is the human element. Let me make that point clear. Generally, the results are better with a bad piece of legislation in the hands of good people than a good piece of legislation in the hands of bad people.

Our Nation is and has been fortunate in many ways. We are blessed with abundant natural resources, rainfall, and sunshine, an industrious and honest citizenry and a government run for and by the people. This concept of government gave birth 76 years ago to the enactment of the legislation from which our civil service merit system is derived.

The Nation is fortunate that the legislators of that day had the wisdom and vision to look so well into the future. Without the benefit of that act, I fear we would not have attracted and could not have retained the high type of personnel needed to effectively carry out our many and varied Federal programs.

A good public opinion will not come our way easily or quickly nor will it remain with us long unless it is deserved. Unless we serve well and faithfully we do not deserve nor should we expect a good public opinion. To the end that we continue to warrant a good public opinion, we should reexamine our purpose in being where we are and in doing what we are doing.

We should each dedicate ourself to the task of giving the public better service by doing our job as efficiently, effectively and economically as humanly possible.

Whatever our field—whatever our assignment—the world of today is a challenge to each of us to do our best that tomorrow may be better.

I think every position in the Federal service should have a purpose. If it doesn't, its existence can't be justified. Every employee should know fully the purpose of his position and periodically renew his dedication to the fulfillment of that purpose.

You, Congress, and the leaders in the executive branch must be alert to the needs for maintaining the kind of civil service system in which you can be proud to serve.

I am sorry to say, this administration has not been alert to those needs during the past 6 years. Some of the appointments it has asked Congress to approve as leaders of this civil service system have left much to be desired.

I am happy to say, it looks as if Rip Van Winkle has finally awakened to needs of the service. The recent appointment sent to the Senate for Chairman of the Civil Service Commission leads me to believe they are at long last taking a proper look at this important post.

I sincerely hope they follow up this appointment with a good legislative program to make the service more attractive and to reward you for a job well done.

Maybe this is too much to hope for; maybe this new found respect for the civil service system is still in such infancy that they do not have a bold new program to submit.

As for me I took the Democratic majority leader's recent words very seriously—when he said to the administration—"Lead or be led." He was endorsing my actions for the past 6 years. I think you all are aware of the accomplishments I refer to.

As for the future, I will offer a bold new program. I hope the administration will join with me. If they do, the task will be made easier. If they don't, I will do it anyway.

I have already introduced legislation to—

1. Create a Federal employees health insurance program: As chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I am going to recommend to the committee that this be the first order of business. If we receive any kind of cooperation from the administration, this bill should become law before this session adjourns.

I am grateful to the subcommittee of the Government Employees Council for preparing this legislation. I know it represents many days of hard work.

2. Modify the Group Life Insurance Act to permit employees to purchase two times the amount of their salary; many employees have expressed the desire to be able to increase the amount of insurance they are allowed to purchase under present law.

3. Increase the per diem and travel allowance: I believe the present allowance is completely unrealistic. It was set in 1955. Recent surveys show the cost of travel has increased greatly since that time.

4. Allow persons convicted of an offense not involving the national security to draw the annuity they have earned, paid for, and are entitled to.

5. Preserve the rates of compensation of wage board employees whose positions are reduced in grade; and

6. Give employee organizations the right to represent their members and participate more fully in the formulation of personnel policies and practices.

During a recent trip to several European countries, I was impressed with the fact that the governments of most of these countries maintain a splendid working relationship with leaders of employee organizations.

These, then, are some of the things I hope to accomplish, to help insure for you a brighter and better tomorrow.

I say, thank you, for a job well done.

Good luck and God bless you all.

Importation of Firearms

OF

HON. LESTER HOLTZMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing a bill which would prohibit the importation into the United States of certain firearms.

I had introduced similar legislation in the 83d and 84th Congresses, but these measures prohibited members of the armed services and their dependents from bringing into this country pistols, revolvers, and other types of small firearms. The Department of the Army had submitted an adverse report on this legislation, primarily due to the fact that they felt that the bill would discriminate against military personnel and their dependents.

Last year I eliminated the provision restricting the ban to members of the Armed Forces only, and have asked that the prohibition be extended to everyone—civilian and military alike—who would bring such weapons into the country.

I have been in touch with many law-enforcement officers throughout the United States, and the vast majority of them have endorsed this legislation and have agreed that any attempt to keep dangerous weapons out of the hands of criminals, potential criminals, children, and irresponsible individuals should receive the full support of all those interested in combating crime, and minimizing tragedy which results when some of these guns are accidentally fired. Our own district attorney, in Queens County, N.Y., one of the most heavily populated counties in the country, the Honorable Frank D. O'Connor, has agreed with me that the supply of illicit weapons should be stopped at its source, and fully supports the proposed measure.

Statistics have shown that as many as 50,000 of these contraband weapons have been brought into the United States on just one troopship returning from the European theater. Multiply that by the number of troopships and the number of civilians bringing such weapons into the country and we have an astounding figure.

I have been informed that in one county of New York City 75 percent of the crimes of violence have been and are being committed with these so-called souvenirs. Every day we read in the papers or hear over the radio and television of tragic accidents which occur, and of crimes which have been committed with these weapons. Just the other day Police Commissioner Kennedy issued a report indicating a substantial increase in crimes of violence in the city of New York.

The time has come to put an end to this potentially explosive situation. We simply cannot afford to wait any longer and must make a determined effort to prevent these crimes and mishaps at their source. I can think of no better way than by banning the importation of these weapons and by preventing them from getting into the hands of those who might be tempted to use them illegally or carelessly.

I urge my colleagues to give this legislation every possible consideration.

Rumanian Freedom

OF

HON. RAY J. MADDEN

OF INDIANA

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from a speech made by me Thursday evening, January 22, 1959, on the occasion of the dinner given by the League of Free Romanians in Washington, D.C., commemorating a century since the reestablishment of Rumanian independence:

Mr. Farcasanu, ladies and gentlemen, the event we commemorate this evening is indeed a historical one. It commemorates the 100th anniversary of the firm intervention of the Western Powers in order to reestablish the independence of Rumania's lands and thus stem the Russian invasion in Europe, suggests a definite similarity as to the basic facts of today's situation.

A century ago, Moscow imperialism was making aggressive inroads toward the heart of Europe. It was at that moment, after a long and bitter experience, that the Western Powers realized that asquiescing in Russian encroachment in Eastern Europe was not the proper method to insure the balance of power in Europe. The security of nations in Europe depended on checking the Russian advance, or peace in Europe would be in permanent jeopardy.

At the Treaty of Paris in 1856 a successful attempt was made to substitute collective action on the part of the concert of Europe for aggression by Russia. Today a greater alliance of free people is confronted by the recurring and intensified danger from Moscow under communism. This danger has spread from the relatively small area of Eastern Europe to the greater part of Asia. The problem which now faces all those who stand for freedom is to stop the expansion of a ruthless Soviet tyranny aiming at world domination. The dimensions and implications of this issue are far greater today. The new feature of this Soviet drive for world dominion is its implacable and universal subversive organization.

As chairman of the House committee investigating the Katyn Forest massacres, I had the sad opportunity to go deeply into the ruthlessness of Soviet Communist schemes. The coldblooded killing of thousands of proallied Polish officers and civilians was done with the same cynicism and purpose as the wholesale murder of the Hungarian freedom fighters; the purpose being, by physically liquidating the fighting elite of these nations, as they did also in Rumania and elsewhere, to destroy the backbone of independence in the respective countries.

But in spite of it all hate for Soviet-Communist domination is deeper than ever. That is one of the reasons why, in Rumania for instance, the Soviets have organized the largest concentration camp in Europe, the Danube-Black Sea Canal and recently, after the Hungarian uprising, the Danube Delta slave-labor camp. It is reported that this Danube Delta camp is an international pool of slaves, where besides Rumanians there are Hungarians, Poles, Koreans, Germans, and others.

These are a few features of a situation on which the Soviets would like us to make new agreements implying fresh concessions either in the West or in the East. Such concessions would consolidate and augment the menacing strength of the aggressive Red bloc.

I am sure the American people now sense the inherent danger latent in any new concessions. Our own security requires, on the contrary, that we uncompromisingly follow a policy of restoring freedom to Rumania and other Soviet satellite nations.

The following is a statement by Rev. Father Eugene Lazar, of 1133 Madison Street, Gary, Ind., made at a dinner given Sunday, January 25, observing the 100th anniversary in East Chicago, Ind.:

THE CENTENNIAL OF THE UNION OF THE PRINCIPALITIES OF MOLDAVIA AND MUNTENIA UNDER ALEXANDER ION CUZA

Saturday, January 24, marks the observance of the 100th anniversary of the Union of the Principalities of Moldavia and Muntenia under Alexander Ion Cuza. The event is one of the most important in the history of the Rumanian people.

The 19th century was a time of flourishing idealisms and of realizations for the national state. Some of the most recent writings claim that the beginnings of such attitudes are to be found in the 16th century writing of Machiavelli. It took much time before it came to the attention of the political and spiritual leaders of Europe, that the people aspired for a free and independent national life. The completion of this movement commenced with the unification of Germany and of Italy in 1870–71. The principles of self-determination of President Woodrow Wilson and of the peace treaty of Versailles, which had adopted this principle, further solidified this world change.

A hundred years ago when Rumania was not to be found on the maps of Europe as it was known in later years, brothers of the same nationality and blood of the two principalities of Moldavia and Muntenia were forced to fight each other for the ambitions of foreign sovereignty. Rumanians decided to end this situation with the election of the same sovereign in both Moldavia and Muntenia in the person of Col. Alexander Ion Cuza.

During that period of time the peasants were exploited without any compassion by the lords, who in the majority were foreigners.

Alexander Ion Cuza, who himself was the son of a lord, understood the peasants' situation better than anyone else, and gave heed to the cry and aspiration of the peasants, and began to give justice to the people, and gave to the people some of the land that they had worked for their masters.

This certainly could not have been of any liking to the lords and therefore began to maneuver through the liberal and conservative party to force Cuza to resign. The first try at dethroning Cuza, the "lord of the peasants" was in 1865, during the absence of Cuza from the country.

To a great extent the parallel can be made between Lincoln and Cuza, each in his manner—unifying a torn country and freeing those that had been oppressed. Another Cuza will arise, not only in Rumania, but in other Iron Curtain nations, and destroy the Communist tyrant and restore liberty and self-government. Freedom-loving people throughout the world hope that day is not far distant.

Social Security Benefits

OF

HON. ALVIN M. BENTLEY

OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, on January 7, 1959, I introduced H.R. 1221, a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase from $1,200 to $1,800 a year the amount of outside income permitted without deductions from benefits, and to provide that all types of income shall be taken into account in determining whether an individual's benefits are subject to such deductions. I have now requested the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to ignore this bill and am today introducing another bill which would embody the first part only of H.R. 1221, that is, the increase of outside earnings or wages permitted without deducting from benefits.

As might be expected, Mr. Speaker, I have received a substantial volume of mail in protest against the second part of H.R. 1221 which would have included all forms of income, earned and unearned, for the purpose of determining outside income. Many of those who wrote me stated that I was in effect penalizing persons who by virtue of thrift have been able to invest in stocks, bonds, or various forms of rental income to supplement their social security benefits following retirement. I have replied to such persons that this was not at all my intent and that I did not actually seek to make this particular provision a part of title II of the Social Security Act. I rather intended to focus attention upon the entire question of limitations on outside income which, to me, completely destroy the insurance concept of the social security program. To my way of thinking, it is manifestly unfair to have the present low limitation of $1,200 per annum on earned income and no limit at all on unearned income and my introduction of H.R. 1221 was merely intended to point up this inequity. I am firmly convinced, Mr. Speaker, that an individual who has contributed to the social security program the required number of quarters should be permitted to draw his benefits without any regard to his earnings from other sources as is the case after he has passed age 72. What the present law does, however, is to force people to retire from gainful employment upon reaching their 65th birthday if they desire to avail themselves of social security benefits.

As a matter of fact, the entire concept of an arbitrary and fixed retirement age does not appear to me to be sound. I am sure every Member of the House knows many people who, both physically and mentally, are well qualified to continue gainful employment past the age of 65. I am equally certain that every Member of the House knows others who should be retired substantially in advance of that age. I must confess that at the moment I see no practical possibility of making the social security retirement age more flexible, but I do wish to voice my objection to it in principle.

What is the position of the administration on the question of raising the limit on outside income? I think this is best set forth by the following texts of two reports, one from the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare dated October 2, 1957, and one from the deputy to the Secretary of Treasury dated February 28, 1958, and both addressed to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. It will be noted that both Departments are opposed to the enactment of such legislation at this time:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, October 2, 1957.

Hon. JERE COOPER,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in reply to your requests of May 8 and March 25, 1957, for a report on H.R. 4636 and H.R. 4828, bills which would amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase the amount of outside earnings permitted without deductions from benefits thereunder.

H.R. 4636 would increase from $1,200 to $1,800 and H.R. 4828 would increase from $1,200 to $2,400 the amount a beneficiary under age 72 may earn in a year without losing any old-age and survivors insurance benefits for the year. H.R. 4828 would leave unchanged the unit ($80) by which the total yearly earnings in excess of the exempt amount are divided to determine the maximum number of monthly benefits which may be withheld by reason of earnings. H.R. 4636 would increase the unit to $120.

The limitation on the amount of earnings a beneficiary may have and still receive benefits is necessary if the benefits are to be restricted to persons who have substantially retired from gainful work and to dependents of retired or deceased workers who do not themselves have substantial earned income. (For practical reasons, the same earnings test is used to determine whether the worker has retired and whether a dependent has substantial earned income.) Under present law a person can work enough to earn $2,088 a year and still receive at least 1 month's benefit. If he does not earn more than $1,200 in a year, he can receive all of his benefits for the year.

While it is difficult to determine the exact amount of earnings that most satisfactorily discriminates between retirement and nonretirement, the Department believes that the present exemption of $1,200 is preferable to the higher exemptions proposed by H.R. 4636 and H.R. 4828.

Even with the present test, some people can continue to work full time at their usual level of earnings and still receive benefits. For example, workers who have been earning at the rate of $2,000 a year can, after reaching retirement age, receive 2 months' benefits in the year without in any way changing their work activity. In 1955, 21 percent of the workers under old-age and survivors insurance with earnings credits in all calendar quarters had earnings of $2,000 or less; many of these no doubt were full-time workers. Any increase in the amount of earnings exempt under the earnings test would increase the number of persons who could continue in their regular jobs and still receive benefits. If the exempt amount were increased to $1,800 and the unit used to divide earnings in excess of the exempt amount were increased to $120 as proposed in H.R. 4636, persons earning as much as $3,120 a year could continue in their jobs and receive 1 month's benefit.

If H.R. 4636 or H.R. 4828 were enacted, the cost of the old-age and survivors insurance program would be increased. The estimated level-premium cost of H.R. 4636, on an intermediate-cost basis, would be 0.53 percent of payroll. The cost of H.R. 4828 would be 0.90 percent. The additional cost resulting from an increase in the amount of earnings exempt from the earnings test would be incurred for the benefit of only a small percentage of the old-age and survivors insurance beneficiaries and these would be persons who already had substantial income from work. The great majority of beneficiaries do not have substantial earnings.

We therefore recommend that H.R. 4636 and H.R. 4828 not be enacted by the Congress.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it perceives no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

———— ————,
Secretary.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 28, 1958.

Hon. WILBUR D. MILLS,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request for the Department's views on H.R. 4636 to amend section 203 of the Social Security Act to increase the amount of outside earnings permitted without deductions from benefits, and to liberalize the provisions under which such earnings are charged for purposes of such deductions.

H.R. 4636 would increase from $1,200 to $1,800 a year the amount of income a beneficiary under age 72 may earn without losing any old-age and survivors insurance benefits for the year. In addition, it would increase from $80 to $120 the unit by which the total yearly earnings in excess of the exempt amount are divided to determine the maximum number of monthly benefits which may be withheld by reason of earnings.

Two aspects of this bill are of particular concern to this Department.

If enacted, H.R. 4636 would increase present and prospective benefit payments substantially without at the same time increasing social security contributions. Responsibility for the payment of social security benefits is vested in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and that Department has estimated that on an intermediate-cost basis the increase in the cost of the program would approximate a level-premium cost of one-half percent of payrolls. This would result in a corresponding weakening of the financial soundness of the insurance program. We concur in the opposition of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to such increases in benefits and costs of the old-age and survivors insurance program.

Moreover, a liberalization of the earnings test for social security benefit purposes would have important implications for the retirement income credit allowed under the individual income tax. As your committee is aware, discrepancies between the tax treatment of social security benefits and other forms of retirement income have been a concern for a number of years. In the Revenue Act of 1954, the tax credit for retirement income was adopted to equalize the treatment of individuals receiving taxable retirement incomes with those receiving exempt social security benefits. In that connection, a deliberate effort was made to parallel the provisions governing the tax credit, including the earnings test, in the income tax with provisions in the Social Security Act. The amount of income which retired individuals could earn without reducing their retired income credit was fixed at $900 to parallel the annual earnings test of $900 which insured workers could earn without reducing social security benefits. In 1956, the amount of income which could be earned without reducing the credit was raised from $900 to $1,200 to parallel a corresponding increase in the earnings test provided under the 1954 amendments to the Social Security Act.

Enactment of H.R. 4636 would again unbalance the social security and retirement income credit provisions and stimulate pressures for a corresponding adjustment in the provisions of the retirement income credit. Such adjustment would not only reduce income tax revenues but raise additional questions concerning the relative income tax treatment of retired workers and other groups in the population.

In view of these considerations, this Department recommends against enactment of H.R. 4636.

The Director, Bureau of the Budget, has advised the Treasury Department that there is no objection to the presentation of this report.

Sincerely yours,

DAN THROOP SMITH,
Deputy to the Secretary.

The thing that both departments appear to overlook is the fact that over a period of time the steadily increasing cost of living has made many social security benefits completely inadequate to maintain a respectable standard of living. There are obviously two ways to solve this problem. One is to further increase the benefits and thereby incur the necessity of either higher payroll taxes or an additional increase in the income base for social security purposes. Having carefully studied the recent report of the advisory council on social security financing and the contemplated schedule increases in payroll taxes between now and 1969, a I would hesitate to upset this balance. The other way seems to me to give a little more ability to those past 65 but not yet 72 to supplement their social security benefits with outside earnings of their own. This is what I am interested in accomplishing.

I can appreciate the objections on the part of both the Treasury and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Nevertheless, I regard this problem as an extremely serious one and it is my belief that the Ways and Means Committee should give it careful consideration. If hearings are held by that committee on amendments to the Social Security Act, I trust I will be given an opportunity to testify and further expound my views in this connection. But this time, however, Mr. Speaker, I have taken the floor for the purpose of reassuring those people who protested to me against H.R. 1221 that my sole purpose in originally introducing this bill was to call attention to this present inequity regarding the whole question of outside income under the social security program and not with any idea of penalizing those people who, through thrift, have been able to supplement their retirement income from unearned sources.

There follows the text of my letter to the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee requesting that H.R. 1221 not be acted upon by that committee:

JANUARY 26, 1959.

Hon. WILBUR D. MILLS,
Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to request that my bill, H.R. 1221, which was introduced on January 7, 1959, be ignored and that no action be taken by your committee in connection therewith.

Sincerely yours,

ALVIN M. BENTLEY,
Member of Congress.

Fidel Castro and the New Cuba

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, whether Cuba's new climate of freedom lasts depends largely on Fidel Castro. Castro defends the necessity and fairness of the military trials of accused war criminals. Many important voices have been raised in the United States to protest the trials as drumhead courts-martial and the executions as a blood bath. These procedures are far from ideal, but how significant are these shortcomings?

Many who loathed Batista are sickened by the thought that Fidel Castro, perhaps in spite of himself, may end up just another Latin American strong man ruling for an interval by terror and tribute. This is by no means impossible.

Because I had long admired Castro as a brave fighter against Batista and because I want to do whatever I can, however little, to help the new Cuba to be democratic, I accepted an invitation from Fidel Castro and the Cuban News Reporters Association last week to visit Havana. My distinguished colleague, ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, was also visiting Cuba at this time and will make his own report to the House of Representatives. His deep interest in the Caribbean area is well known.

I was there Wednesday and Thursday. I attended the mammoth rally. I spoke with Fidel Castro, with President Urrutia, whom I had previously known and respected as a determined and democratic anti-Batista man, with cabinet ministers whose merits I had read about in a State Department dossier I read on my way down to Havana; with our top Embassy officials; with 26th of July leaders, with seasoned Latin American newspaper reporters, and with ordinary Cubans both rich and poor.

Of course it is conceded that some people feel they can fly through the stratosphere over any country and immediately become qualified as experts in all aspects of the country's political, economic, and social affairs. I confess that my 2 days on Cuban soil, though very busy days, may not have qualified me fully to advise Castro, our State Department, and United States citizens generally on this delicate, crucial period in Cuban history.

Whatever my credentials, here is my report:

It has been my good fortune to visit Colombia, Venezuela, Honduras, and now Cuba within the past 2 years in each instance after the ousting of a dictator. My interest in hemispheric affairs no doubt exceeds my information. I am still learning and there still are several countries in this hemisphere for me to visit.

WARM ABRAZO OR FORMAL HANDSHAKE?

If Castro's Cuba is in fact an emerging democracy, then the newly adopted policy of our Goverment requires our rendering a warm abrazo. If this is not true, then a cool, formal handshake only should be proffered in our relationships. This follows Dr. Milton Eisenhower's recent proposals which the President has endorsed.

My good friend and respected mentor, the senior Senator from my State, is deeply respected in Cuba as elsewhere in the world for his unflinching and aggressive liberalism. Senator WAYNE MORSE has referred to the executions in Cuba as a "blood bath" and has stated that "the Castro regime shot many Batista people without a semblance of a fair trial," although he adds, "I haven't any doubt that a fair trial would have found them guilty."

Senator MORSE is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs. He has always been an outspoken foe of dictators.

Another friend whose qualifications and motives are above question is John O'Rourke, distinguished editor of the Washington Daily News and immediate past president of the Inter-American Press Association. On January 23, 1959, he editorialized in his paper as follows:

Few will deny that Batista was an evil man—and good riddance. But Fidel Castro's determination to proceed with "rebel justice"—drumhead trials, mob juries, and arbitrary executions—cannot avoid stirring second thoughts among those who hoped the revolution signaled the end of tyranny.

Here also is a friendly voice which cannot be ignored.

Another hardworking and sincere friend of Latin America, Senator GEORGE SMATHERS, of Florida, has urged his colleagues and the public to reserve judgment on the Cuban revolution until events more clearly show what has happened there. He believes it is too early to tell whether the revolution was a victory for freedom or simply a change in dictatorships.

WIDE EDITORIAL CRITICISM

Editorial comment in Oregon and throughout the Nation has been adversely critical for the most part. An article by S. L. A. Marshall, January 21, 1959, on the editorial page of the New York Herald-Tribune refers to "Cuba's new strong man harvesting vengeance in the name of the revolution" and to "swift, farcical trials and firing squads working as callously as if they were slaughtering beeves."

The Louisville Courier-Journal recently made an editorial comment that "the demand for vengeance is still short-circuiting the orderly processes of democratic justice."

My own hometown newspaper, the Eugene Register-Guard, approved Senator MORSE's words "blood bath" as accurate and states that the world wishes Castro well but that "he cannot keep the favor of decent people around the globe if he sanctions the same terrorist tactics that the world deplored in the deposed dictator, Batista."

What about these charges?

Are they true?

Are Fidel Castro and the new Cuba fast returning to the same old "strong man" situation?

No, I do not believe that there has been any blood bath in Cuba nor do I believe that Castro and his 26th of July movement are denying fair trial to accused war criminals, although I believe their procedures should be much improved.

My opinion is based on 2 years of observing the Cuban situation.

What is a blood bath?

I would say it was irresponsible, indiscriminate killing of persons. As for drumhead trials or lack of elementary due process, I suppose that means the accused not knowing exactly the charges against him, not being confronted with the witnesses against him, and not having a proper opportunity to defend himself.

Persons critical of the trials and executions are not, in my judgment, fully informed, often through no fault of their own. They do not realize the magnitude and high morality of the revolution.

Before Batista's frantic flight to Trujillo's haven for defeated dictators, I had met many Cuban revolutionaries in the United States and elsewhere in the hemisphere. Manuel Urrutia, the provisional President, Ernesto Betancourt, the Washington representative of the movement, Tony Varona, former president of the Cuban Senate, Dr. and Mrs. Santos Buch, and many others were well known to me.

NOT A RABBLE IN ARMS

These revolutionaries were devout, not fanatic; humble, not arrogant; angry, but not bloodthirsty. Last week I met many who served in the ranks. My impressions square with those of impartial observers who lived with them in the mountains. The Castro men are restrained, disciplined, and dedicated to their task. They are not a rabble in arms.

The rebels tortured no one. They shot no prisoners. Even after victory there is no report of looting or violence by them. Theirs is a crusade for an honest and terror-free Cuba, not a conquistadorial drive for wealth and power. Priests and Protestant ministers were attached to the rebel forces. Batista's army had no chaplains at all.

In short, and I invite you to ask anyone who knows Castro and his men, the 26th of July movement is not made up of men who would indulge in or allow irresponsible, indiscriminate killing or, if you will, a blood bath.

Since Castro took over in Cuba there has been respect for civil liberties. The press has been entirely free. Many journalists have roamed all over the island with notebook, tape recorder, and movie camera. Whatever else the revolution may or may not be, it is newsworthy.

I have followed these reports closely and I have yet to see a specific allegation that even one accused war criminal was denied elementary due process or that a particular one of them was unjustifiably executed. I asked veteran newspapermen in Havana if they knew of any such instance. They did not. They were convinced that the men executed deserved conviction and that they had had a fair opportunity to defend themselves at their trials.

During Batista's years of terror there was censorship. "Official" acts of cruelty and murder were kept out of print. Huge sums of money were spent by the Government to bribe both publishers and reporters. It is no wonder that many persons in the United States thought Castro's insistence on the continuance of these trials harsh and ominous.

"There is hardly a family which has not felt the brutality of the Batista police," a Life correspondent reported—Life, January 26, 1959. Time magazine for the same date reports:

Many of the Batista cops who faced the firing squads last week were proved killers whose twisted minds drew pleasure from pain. To extract secrets from captured rebels, they yanked out fingernails, carbonized hands and feet in red-hot vises. Castration was a major police weapon.

Bodies were left in sun-speckled streets as police warnings. One Santiago cop of the Batista regime, trying to break down a rebel woman, brought one of her brother's eyeballs on a platter to her cell. Other rebels were forced to watch their wives raped by cops. A U.S. resident of Santiago, who chanced upon Police Chief Rafael Salas Canizares shooting 4 young rebels dead in the street, reported:

"He was in a state of maniacal ecstasy—face flushed, eyes bright, breathing hard."

CASES CAREFULLY PREPARED

The cases against the accused war criminals were not hastily concocted on the say-so of some hysterical woman who might or might not be telling the truth. The movement had many spies. Almost every Cuban was against Batista.

Vehicle movements of Batista men were carefully checked. Pictures were taken. Batista's policy was to allow pictures of torture victims to become available widely. He wanted to terrorize the rebels and their friends.

Dossiers were prepared by the rebels. Many of Batista's murderers and torturers escaped when the Government fell. Those who did not are being tried by military courts under war criminal laws similar to those the Allies employed in Germany after World War II.

"If I allow just one man to be killed unjustly, I destroy my whole movement," Castro told me very seriously when I first talked with him. We were jammed together with his chiefs and with journalists from all over the hemisphere on the speakers' platform at the rally last Wednesday.

This was the rally where he asked those who supported the continuance of the trials to raise their hands. Of course I deplore such tactics and others he has used. Let me make it clear, however, that I believe in the good faith of Fidel Castro and the new Cuban Government. These men are not vengefully killing people, nor are they harvesting vengeance or giving swift, farcial trials, or allowing firing squads to work callously as if they were slaughtering beeves.

If wanton murder and inhuman torture are capital crimes, and they are in the rebel war criminal code, those executed deserved to dic and were permitted to do so far less painfully than their victims.

We fought a war to make the world safe for democracy but the fact is that a Democrat in Latin America in the past several decades has lived a precarious life and often died a painful death. The recent overthrow of a number of dictators gives reason to hope that the hemisphere may become unsafe for tyrants and their menials.

CASTRO, NOT THE MOB, RULES

At his gigantic press conference last Wednesday, which included almost 400 newsmen and lasted 5 hours, Castro said that a public opinion poll showed that 93 percent of the Cubans wanted all the imprisoned accused war criminals executed. "But they will receive fair trials," he said. "I am not so radical as the people."

Senator MORSE's suggestion to Castro that he invite a United Nations observation team to Cuba to investigate the war crimes procedures is of course a good one. I strongly recommended its careful consideration when I spoke with the highest officials in the new government and with Castro. A committee from the Organization of American States or from the Inter-American Bar Association could serve the same purpose.

I personally do not need convincing as to the motives of Castro and the new government, but an outside group of ability and prestige could do much to reassure many Cubans and their apprehensive friends elsewhere. A minister of the new government assured me that these suggestions were being explored and considered.

When I sat next to Fidel Castro at dinner last Thursday evening I told him that I thought it was wrong to hold war crimes trials in the Sports Palace and to allow unrestrained press, radio, and TV coverage. A man's trial for his life, I said, should not be made a spectacle. The first—and I hope last—such trial was barely 2 hours old when I said this.

TOO LITTLE AND TOO MUCH

As I spoke I felt the irony of my words because a few days earlier I had been urging the new Cuban Government to invite newsmen and various opinion leaders to observe for themselves the war-crimes procedures. I cabled President Urrutia that the new Cuba had nothing to hide. Castro had a right to feel baffled about an outside world that apparently did not know its own mind.

I pointed out the middle way: A small courtroom, spectators and journalists limited in numbers; dignity yet no hint of star-chamber proceedings.

I predicted the outcry that did in fact ensue. The following day he radioed from Caracas to stop the trials in the Sports Palace and take away the TV and radio coverage.

I shall refrain from claiming credit for this move. Many others no doubt were saying the same thing to him. It does demonstrate, however, his ability to learn and his wish to do what is right.

Castro is not infallible. He is 32 years old and without broad experience. He makes mistakes. I think he is entitled to a few mistakes considering his accomplishments and his great responsibilities.

Operation Truth brought almost 400 newsmen from every country in the hemisphere except the Dominican Republic. They came at the expense of the new Cuban Government and were in addition to the journalists already there. They rightly criticized the circus quality of the trial in the Sports Palace but they also agreed that the legal procedures used were fair.

"Better understanding abroad of the provisional government's aims was foreseen as a result of the public trials," said an Associated Press story, January 24, 1959, in the Washington Evening Star. Better understanding can come without boisterous public spectators, TV and radio coverage. Press coverage, on a pool basis if need be, is of course essential.

If Castro had been after power and money he could have much of both firmly in his grasp by now. Instead he set up the provisional government under President Manuel Urrutia. Neither Urrutia nor his Ministers are men who would act as puppets for Castro or anyone else. The State Department prepared a notebook with their biographies for me to read on my way down to Havana. I was impressed by the fine qualifications of these men.

AMATEURS IN POLITICS

Of course, like Castro himself, many of them are amateurs in politics. They will need help and forbearance until they learn how Cuba can be governed effectively in conditions of honesty and human freedom.

Castro now governs Cuba but the signs are that he will soon turn over his great powers to the new government. He drives himself relentlessly but manages to keep his sense of humor and humility. His remark about 200,000 gringos dying was a flippant sally in answer to a newsman's flippant query as to what would happen if the United States sent the Marines to Cuba. The U.S. press solemnly printed this as a bragging threat and called him a demagog. He is wryly rueful about the incident, but I think certain reporters have more to answer for than Castro. I am certain that he is not anti-United States at all.

Fidel Castro can mean democracy at long last for Cuba or he can mean disillusionment and another strong man government. His present reign is characterized by confused disorganization but much good will and dedication in preparing for a democratic Cuba. One of his young bodyguards, a U.S. citizen from Brooklyn, told me, "Fidel uses C.S.T., Castro Standard Time—6 hours late."

He needs counsel from experienced Latin American democrats like Governor Muñoz-Marín of Puerto Rico, Costa Rican ex-President Jose (Pepe) Figueres, Colombian President Alberto Lleras Camargo and Venezuelan President-elect Romulo Betancourt.

These men can tell him much he needs to know about relationships with Cuba's immediate neighbors, the United States, and Soviet Russia. Fidel Castro has it within his power to win a place in the history books as a great builder of Latin American democracy as well as a guerrilla leader of a highly popular revolution.

TIME TO SHAVE THE BEARDS

If this is to come about, he will have to seek solitude and to allow the provisional government to rule Cuba and to set the stage for free elections in 18 months. This will be hard to do, but it must be done.

I told him, with my usual tact and omniscience, that he and his followers should now shave or trim their beards and that they should discard their characteristic fatigue uniforms for the regular Cuban military uniforms. Nothing would mark more dramatically the passing of the combat phase to the civilian phase of the fight for a democratic Cuba.

Castro made a mistake in naming his brother Raul as his successor in case of death. Successor to what? This is the move of a strong man, not a man who wants an orderly lawful government to rule in Cuba. Upon reflection I think he will want to remove the mantle of succession from Raul's shoulders—and then destroy the mantle.

His demand that the United States return Cuban war criminals and the money they stole is another indication of his incomplete education in public affairs. It is up to Cuba to indict these men and to invoke reciprocal treaties providing for extradition.

The trials should be slowed down. Cuba is at peace, and civil judges, not military judges, should sit on the bench. More time should be allowed for the preparation of defense cases, although I have yet to hear or read of any protest on these grounds made by an accused war criminal or on his account. I urged these changes in policy in writing before I went to Cuba and personally when I was there to President Urrutia, Castro, and Secretary of Justice Angel Fernandez.

SENATOR MORSE'S FRIENDLY ATTITUDE

I agree entirely with Senator MORSE's statement:

> It is not too late. We want to be friends of the new leadership of Cuba. I believe the leaders are democratically motivated. When a wrong develops, steps should be taken to correct the wrong.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, speaking in the other body January 20, 1959, and commending Senator MORSE's stand for better judicial processes in the war criminal trials, said that Senator MORSE "has been principled in his comment and stand and, at the same time, considerate and tolerant."

I hope the people of Cuba realize that the remarks which have been made by Members of the Senate, and in particular by the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs [Mr. MORSE], were made not in a spirit of hostility, bitterness, or antagonism, but rather in a spiirt of understanding, friendship, advice, and kindly admonition. They were made in a sincere effort to maintain wholesome, respectful, and cordial relationships between the people of Cuba and the people of the United States.

Castro needs rest. He needs time to ruminate, time for contemplation and study, then consultation with others and travels in Cuba and elsewhere. If he does not withdraw, he will inevitably diminish, then destroy, the authority of the new government. This will make the transition period difficult and perhaps impossible.

Many Cubans will protest his withdrawal into the wings at this time. They will cry, with understandable concern, that Cuba needs him. More than Castro, Cuba needs a functioning government, honest and mindful of human freedoms. Castro has no desk, no organization for government, and no time or ability to decide the many and often complex issues brought to him. Most important of all, he has no business trying to do what the provisional government was established to do.

"NOT UNDER MAN"

As a thoughtful lawyer Castro can recall Coke's famous proposition, inscribed in Latin on the pediments of Langdell Hall at Harvard Law School, "Not under man, but under God and the law." This proposition, in addition to being right and just, is the only feasible way to run a government today and to maintain human freedoms.

As I said goodby to him Wednesday evening he said I had given him things to think about. My bet is that he will find time to think. Cuba's emerging democracy will be realized without still another bloody detour.

What about our Government's policies now?

In my opinion they are excellent, both in theory and practice. Last Wednesday morning in Havana I conferred with the Chargé d'Affaires, First Secretary Dan Braddock, and the top Embassy staff people for about an hour. Our various programs are all set to resume operations, awaiting only necessary organizational moves of the new Cuban Government. Our men there have the right attitude about extending the warm abrazo to this Government of honorable and democracy-minded men.

After two sorry experiences with amateurs, we are now sending a first-rate career Ambassador to Cuba, Philip Wilson Bonsal, a man who, according to the New York Times, January 22, 1959, "does not strive to conceal his strong preference for democratic governments."

In my opinion much credit must be accorded to William Wieland, the State Department's director for Cuba, Mexico, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic. He is highly competent and conscientious. Mr. Wieland was a United Press reporter at the time of the dictator Machado in Cuba. He was jailed for his activities against that tyrant. His sympathies are unchanged. However, he dealt honorably and correctly with all Cuban factions, winning the respect of all those who themselves were respectable.

ADDITIONAL AID IS AVAILABLE

We have further aid available for Cuba. All the new government has to do is ask. The request will receive careful and favorable consideration. This is also a bit ironic, for our official governmental policy is far more friendly to the new Cuba than are many vocal opinion leaders and many editorial writers.

Often the reverse has been true.

My explanation is that in this case the Government is better informed as to the character of the men who threw Batista out and as to the nature and extent of the crimes of the accused war criminals and as to the procedures by which these men are being tried.

Fidel Castro and his friends who seek to bring democracy to Cuba need and deserve our sympathy, our forbearance, and support. Our condonation for acts of cruelty is not solicited because, so far as I have read the record made by the free and active press, they are not guilty of any such acts.

Democracy is not won by vanquishing a tyrant. It is won by fostering human freedoms and basing the government on the results of free elections. Democracy is an equilibrium. Once attained, it has to be retained.

Expediency and indifference can destroy democracy. This is why the United States must concern itself with the development of democracies in other lands, and particularly with respect to a close neighbor like Cuba. To the extent we encourage democracy elsewhere we help maintain and strengthen our own standards of human freedom.

Faith without works will fade. The more faith in democracy we export, the more we have.

I hope that many of my colleagues and other fellow citizens will have occasion soon to visit Cuba and to see for themselves what a tremendously significant revolution has taken place.

This, then, is the report of a recent tourist about his 2-day trip to Cuba, a freed and freedom-loving Cuba, a pro-American Cuba, a peaceful and law-abiding Cuba, a Cuba that needs and deserves our help in its historic opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include the following items: A letter to the editor of the New York Times of January 25, 1959, from my colleague, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES]; an editorial from the Times for January 23; and a column by Drew Pearson as it appeared in the Miami Herald for January 23:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 25, 1959]

OUR CUBAN POLICY QUERIED—PRESENT ANTI-AMERICANISM DECLARED RESULT OF OUR SUPPORT OF BATISTA

(The writer of the following letter, formerly Governor of Connecticut, was U.S. Ambassador to India from 1951 to 1953. He is now a Member of Congress.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Millions of Americans have been shocked at the brutal manner in which the new Cuban Government has been disposing of many of its adversaries and the bitterness of its attacks on the United States.

Although our disappointment and resentment are understandable, it is important that we appreciate the extent to which our own policies have helped create the antagonism with which we must now contend.

According to the narrow view of many of our policymakers, any dictator who tells us he is against communism, regardless of how hated or corrupt he may be, deserves American support. This has led us time and again to place American dollars and American prestige behind reactionary, rightwing governments which ruthlessly exploit their people and which sooner or later are doomed to fall.

SOURCE OF ARMS

For nearly 3 years the now victorious Cuban revolutionaries were hunted like animals through the mountains and jungles by Batista's armed forces. Many of the Government tanks, planes and small arms which brought death to their families were manufactured in American factories, paid for by American taxpayers and shipped to Cuba by the American Government.

Our Government cannot be held responsible for the brutal behavior of the fallen Cuban dictator. But it can and should be held responsible for the damaging effect which some of our policies and personnel have had in producing the anti-American resentments unleashed by the Cuban revolution.

Our last arms shipment was landed in Cuba scarcely 9 months ago. If the victorious leaders of the new government did not now resent the official support and comfort we gave the vanquished Batista, they would be less than human.

Although this experience has cost us heavily, not only in the respect of Cubans but in that of other non-Communist peoples in all parts of the world, there is scant evidence that we have taken it to heart. On the very day that Castro's revolutionary forces were entering Havana through cheering crowds we announced that a Marine Corps training mission would be sent to Haiti to bolster a government that since last summer has been forced by public opposition to rule by decree.

REVOLUTIONARY PRACTICES

All thoughtful observers regret General Castro's drumhead courts, mass shootings, and his demagogic raving about a "gringo" invasion. But our disappointment should not blind us to the implications of our own failure to live up to what the world expects of us.

The truths which our Declaration of Independence held to be self-evident are still providing the inspiration for non-Communist revolutionary leaders who are challenging dictators in Latin America, Africa and Asia.

Whether the Cuban revolution succeeds or fails in its effort to provide freedom and dignity for the Cuban people will depend largely on what Castro does with his victory in these first few weeks. But this and much more will also depend on our capacity to remember our own revolutionary origins and to bring our policies into focus in a world of revolutionary change.

CHESTER BOWLES.

WASHINGTON, January 21, 1959.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 23, 1959]

HAVANA AND WASHINGTON

A new and what must be a happier chapter in Cuban-American relations is about to begin. Our Ambassador, Philip W. Bonsal, is a splendid choice and Cuba's new Ambassador to Washington, Prof. Ernesto Dihigo, an educator and diplomat of the highest caliber, is certain to represent the revolutionary regime with distinction.

It is time to put aside arguments and recriminations on both sides. There is much constructive work to be done. Cuba has to get her sugar crop going, her roads and railways repaired, and her governmental structure reorganized all the way up from municipalities to the capital of Havana.

Cuba is being reborn. She has the greatest opportunity ever offered in her history to construct a new, free, honest, democratic government. The men now in control have fought, and many of their fellow Cubans suffered torture and death, just for that.

There is a major work of repair to be done in Cuban-American relations. The harsh fact has to be faced that the resentment and bitterness of Cubans against the State Department and American policies rose to a crescendo under the ambassadorships of Arthur Gardner and Earl E. T. Smith. Now a distinguished career diplomat with a splendid record is to take over. Philip Bonsal has every qualification that could be asked for the difficult and gratifying task he is taking on.

Dr. Dihigo, the Cuban Ambassador, is professor of Roman law at the University of Havana, the author of a number of books on international law, a jurist, a former Ambassador to the United Nations, and a former Minister of State. In addition he knows the United States and likes Americans. It is to be hoped that both Ambassadors will get to their posts as soon as possible.

EXECUTION OF TERRORISTS NECESSARY ACT BY CASTRO

(By Drew Pearson)

WASHINGTON.—Though not condoning kangaroo courts and quickie firing squads, Latin American diplomats returning from Cuba report that if Fidel Castro had not proceeded at once with the trial and execution of Batista's chief terrorists, he would not have been able to maintain order in the country.

Continuous censorship during the last year of Batista's reign kept newsmen living there from giving even an approximate picture of the slaughter that was taking place.

As a result, U.S. readers got no real idea how Batista's agents—military and police—operated against suspected civilian sympathizers of Castro's July 26 movement.

On one occasion, for instance, the bodies of 17 university students were thrown on the capital's streets from speeding police cars.

One of the first common graves located in Oriente Province on January 6 contained 183 half-burned corpses.

Impartial medical inspection showed that the majority had been pushed into the hole alive, gasoline poured over all, and the torch applied. There have been half a dozen other similar graves discovered.

As one observer put it: "Castro landed from Mexico on December 2, 1956, with 81 followers. Four months later, after the first skirmishes with Batista's forces, only 12 of that original group were still alive.

"If he hadn't had volunteers flocking to him from the farms and small towns all over Oriente, he would have been finished.

"Relatives of those volunteers—especially brothers and sisters—paid for that support by the thousands, with their lives, their sight, their fingers, or toes, or genital organs, their virginity.

"By the time Castro was ready to start his final big push, early in December, he had 8,000 men and women fighting for him, and one family in three all over Cuba was giving active aid to the rebels.

"There are only a little over 6 million people in Cuba. In every town and city, all the people—whether they were helping Castro or just keeping out of it—knew the names and faces of the Batistia men in their areas who were carrying out the torture, rape, and murder.

"In order to hold his army together and maintain its morale, Castro had to promise that every such agent who was positively identified would be tried by the revolutionary forces, as soon as they won, and shot if convicted.

"If he had reneged on that—failed to seize the terrorists, or held them indefinitely for civilian courts to be reorganized—there would have been a wave of mob lynchings all over Cuba, with at least 2,000 or 3,000 dead by now, instead of 200 or 300, without trial of any kind.

"It's a grim, bloody business, of course, but this was a real civil war, with practically every Cuban involved on one side or the other—not just another one of the palace guard coups that so often pass for revolutions in Latin America."

National YMCA Week, 1959

OF

HON. HOWARD W. ROBISON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 26, 1959

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call attention to the fact that the week just past was National YMCA Week.

During last week, millions of Americans affiliated with nearly 2,000 Young Men's Christian Associations across the country celebrated one more year of fine service to our youngsters, teen-agers, young men, and to our family groups also.

Since 1844, the YMCA has been a pioneer in the cause of brotherhood and development of our youth—the spirit and mind of youth as well as physical well-being. The Y has become also a unique and vital part of virtually every American community.

The YMCA has served our fighting men during every war since the Civil War. It has contributed mightily to health and physical fitness programs and has contributed much to American sports and athletics, creating such games as basketball and volleyball.

The Y has also sponsored organized camping, water-safety instruction, youth and government programs, and boys' work.

The YMCA has also pioneered in night-school education, short-term community finance campaigns, and many other advances.

I am certain that all of us will join in a sincere "well done" to this excellent and growing organization and, we might also add, "Please keep up the good work."

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, Thou who art the light behind life's shadows, and the love behind life's sorrows,

Coming into this temple of our democracy to pray, we would not catalog the sins of others; we would not exult that we are not as other men. But, rather, confessing our own sins, we would pray for Thy forgiveness and Thy cleansing.

We beseech Thee to make us such public servants, so captured and possessed by Thy vast designs for human brotherhood, that Thou canst trust Thy ageless purposes to our willing and eager hands.

We ask only for light enough for the next step, courage enough to face the present duty, truth enough for today's decisions, as into Thy hands we commit our ways.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 23, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, late a Representative from the State of Missouri, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session today, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE TO STUDY THE DEVELOPMENT AND COORDINATION OF WATER RESOURCES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my distinguished senior colleague from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], I submit a resolution which I feel will make a substantial contribution to the Senate's legislative work in the field of water-resource conservation and development.

During this first session of the 86th Congress, the U.S. Senate is faced with many significant and important issues of nationwide importance. Federal aid to education, airport construction, housing, a new farm program, community facilities, foreign aid, and defense are but a few major issues. However, I feel that the congressional program would not be complete if we did not devote considerable time and effort to water conservation. This is a pressing issue, despite the fact that in recent years there has been substantial and significant progress in water-resource development and conservation.

Two of the Senate's standing committees—the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and the Committee on Public Works—are to be highly commended for their work in this area. Both distinguished chairmen of these committees, my able and distinguished colleague, Montana's senior Senator [Mr. MURRAY], and the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], have taken the lead in the enactment of a number of legislative proposals which affect our water resources.

In spite of the conscientious work of these standing committees, and in spite of the unfailing support of water-resource projects provided by the Committee on Appropriations under the eminent chairmanship of the great senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]—in spite of the virtually unanimous effort of all of us who are concerned with water resource matters—we are failing dismally in our responsibility for the Nation's water resources.

Let me explain what is meant by the statement that we are failing in our responsibility for the Nation's water resources.

An abundance of readily available water of suitable quality is a principal requirement of the American way of life, and it is essential for continuing agricultural and industrial production. But responsible authorities warn that provision for the needed water supplies is far short of adequate.

Today, we use water at the rate of about 240 billion gallons a day. By 1975, the rate of use will be about 350 billion gallons a day. There is not now under construction or planned for construction, by public and private agencies combined, water-resource projects that will provide daily 350 billion gallons of water of acceptable quality.

Let us remember that the United States is blessed with an abundance of water—fully enough to meet all national requirements, provided that we wisely and fully develop it for us. Dr. Leopold, Chief Hydrologist of the Geological Survey, points out that, although we as a Nation are not short of water as a whole, "As matters now stand, most water that is immediately available and inexpensive to use at each individual point is in use already."

Mr. President, the United States is not able to tolerate a scarcity of water supplies, available and suitable for use at economic costs. By 1975, our present population of 175 million is expected to be over 225 million, a 30-percent increase; and by 1980 it is expected to be 245 million, a 40-percent increase.

Even at the present rate of per capita water use, this 30 or 40 percent population increase would of itself gravely strain our ability to meet water requirements. Authoritative reports have, however, demonstrated that per capita water uses must increase very substantially over present use. The Chief of Engineers, U.S. Army, has stated that it will rise about 25 percent.

The increase in the rate of per capita water use reflects both the rising standard of individual living and the increased use of water in industry. More water for individual living results from such things as more home washing machines and dishwashers, more air conditioners, more suburban lawns to sprinkle—the incidents of the high standard of living that we are determined to maintain in this country. Increased industrial use of water reflects such requirements as 200,000 gallons of water needed to produce one ton of rayon, 300,000 gallons of water needed to produce a ton of aluminum, and 600,000 gallons of water needed for a ton of synthetic rubber. The Nation's industry is geared to a high-level output of thousands of products that require water in increasing amounts.

These two factors—population increase and per-capita-use increase—are the basis for the authoritative forecasts that by 1975 use requirements will be of the order of 350 billion gallons a day, about 90 percent more water than the amount we used in 1950.

The quantity required is one aspect of the water-resources problem. Another important aspect is the quality of water. Technical experts warn us that water quality deteriorates with population and industrial expansion. They point out that untreated industrial wastes now pouring daily into streams are equal to the sewage produced by 110 million people—double the 1920 rate. Mr. Gordon McCallum, of the Public Health Service, estimates that pollution is costing us at least a billion dollars a year.

Still another important aspect of the water-resources problem is one equally valuable to Americans, even though we may not measure it in billions of dollars. Wildlife and recreation are, in great measure, closely dependent on the wise conservation and development of water resources. From ducks or trout to summer resorts and swimming holes, concern with wildlife and recreation is inseparable from concern with water resources.

All aspects of the water-resources problem—adequate quantity and acceptable quality for population and economic expansion, wildlife, recreation, and others that I have not taken time to discuss now—such as navigation development, hydroelectric power generation, irrigation, flood control, and like purposes—all of these must be fitted together in our water-resources program. This multiple-purpose coordination of water-resource programs, founded on suitable legislation, as it has been since 1936 and earlier, makes multiple-purpose legislation even more essential as the Nation expands its utilization of water. This is because our water resource is, after all, a limited resource, and increasing demands upon it can be met only by continually improved coordination and conservation.

There is widespread public concern over the inadequacy of water-resource programs. This concern stems from recognition that water supplies now available in many areas of the United States will be insufficient in quantity and unacceptable in quality for the use requirements of 1975. In many areas, the future water supply is the key to economic development. It is feared that inadequate and unsuitable water will limit expansion.

I am reminded of the newspaper account I read of a recent address made to a meeting in Texas, the State to which we are indebted for furnishing us with our distinguished majority leader, Mr. JOHNSON. At that meeting, the head of one of the Nation's large industries explained to his Texas listeners why his company is not expanding its plants in Texas, but instead, it is locating new plants elsewhere. The reason is, this industrialist told his audience, that his company would make large investments in plant sites only where it felt secure about the adequacy of future water supplies.

I regret that I am probably speaking for most of my colleagues in the Senate when I say that this experience is repeated in many of our home States. I do not believe that company arrived at a valid judgment regarding Texas water resources, but I do know that the adequacy of future water supplies is a major factor in the selection of plant locations in many industries.

There are, of course, many bright spots on the water-resource horizon. We are on the threshold of an amazing era of technological development. New methods, new processes, and new materials are opening up possibilities in many fields of endeavor. There is no doubt in my mind that these new technical developments can be applied to increasing the usefulness of available water resources. This is a conviction that I am confident is shared by my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]. There are challenging opportunities in new techniques of weather modification, evaporation reduction, desalination of brackish water, conversion of water, and in improvement of conventional processes for seepage control and wastewater salvage. Possibly, application of nuclear energy may result in a major breakthrough for water-resource development.

I have sketched all too synoptically, I fear, the magnitude, the complexity, and the urgency of the water-resource problem. My senior colleague, Mr. MURRAY, and I believe that there is need for a broad gage legislative program as the basis for comprehensive water-resources development by Federal, State, and private agencies. This legislative program should furnish the impetus for coordinated development at a rate that will provide the quantity and quality of water that will be required in the coming years. It should encourage the adoption of new technical discoveries and improvements.

Since 1949, a number of reports, prepared principally under direction of the executive branch, have dealt with broad questions of water-resources policy. Notable among these is the 1950 report of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission, under the chairmanship of Morris L. Cooke. This and the other reports are helpful in identifying certain of the problems. It must be noted, however, that these reports have not become the basis for congressional action; and, in fact, they are not actually addressed to congressional action. Probably this is because they were made under the direction of the executive branch, rather than under congressional direction.

It is our view that such a comprehensive legislative program on water resources necessarily will consist of many, many individual enactments. Experience has demonstrated that the great diversity of conditions and the wide variety of considerations that bear on the water problems of different portions of this Nation preclude any single piece of legislation or any single formula or any single mechanism that would blanket the water-resources problems. Rather, we believe, the legislative program needs to be like a mosaic, in which many individual enactments fit together in a composite design.

To this end, the purpose of our resolution is to secure recommendations for such a legislative program. Those recommendations should delineate the amount, the character, and the timing of water-resource development necessary to meet national requirements in the years ahead. The recommendations should also outline legislation that will encourage new and improved methods of water-resource conservation and development—public and private.

This view of the needed legislative program is, I believe, shared by many other Senators. Formulation of such a many faceted comprehensive and interrelated legislative program overlaps and impinges on the established jurisdiction of several of the regular standing committees of the Senate. Yet there is great present need for an overall legislative design within which each committee can function to mutual advantage.

A closely parallel situation arose in the 84th Congress, and a precedent established then has guided us in this resolution. In the 84th and the 85th Congresses, the Senate felt the need for an overall review and coordination of its foreign-aid legislation. That review impinged on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Appropriations. It was my privilege to sponsor Senate Resolution No. 285, of the 84th Congress. That resolution, as agreed to, with the amendments added by the Committee on Rules and Administration, established a temporary select committee formed of members of the three standing committees concerned. That committee to study the foreign-aid program has performed outstanding service to the Senate, through providing an informal basis for Senate action.

The resolution on the water-resources program, submitted today for myself and the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], is closely patterned on the precedent of the foreign-aid study resolution, S. Res. No. 285, 84th Congress, and provides for a special study committee composed of eight Senators who are members of the standing committees concerned. With respect to water resources, the standing committees principally concerned are the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Public Works. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is affected as to its concern with the fish and wildlife conservation.

As in the case of the foreign-aid program, any Senate action consequent to the recommendations of this water-resources committee would, of course, be in accordance with the established procedures of the Senate; that is, such recommended legislation would be referred to the appropriate standing committee of the Senate.

Subsequently, Mr. President, on a suitable occasion, I shall discuss more fully the manner in which it is hoped that the committee on water resources can, during the 86th Congress, provide to the Senate the substantial assistance that is so much needed in the complex field of water resources.

From their own experiences and observations in their home States, all Senators are aware, I am sure, of the importance and urgency of an adequate and comprehensive legislative program for water resources. I do not wish to delay the business of the Senate by further discussion now of this widely held concept. In closing my remarks, I do, however, wish to call to the attention of the Senate a statement that is germane to the resolution.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed directly at the conclusion of my remarks a short excerpt from the 1958 Report of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund on the U.S. economy. The report was prepared last year by a panel of distinguished men, under the chairmanship of Mr. Thomas B. McCabe, president of the Scott Paper Co., and former Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. Associated with Mr. McCabe in this report on the U.S. economy are 17 other equally distinguished leaders in public affairs. Their names are appended to the excerpt at the conclusion of my remarks.

This panel of distinguished leaders in public affairs, in discussing the national economy, singled out water resources for special discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. MANSFIELD. Also, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the context of this resolution and an article entitled "The Day the Tap Runs Dry," from the October 1958 issue of the Harper's magazine, printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits B and C.)

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, what will happen when the taps run dry is a grave question in terms of 1975 or 1980. Just how serious that threat is has been demonstrated by actual events. Taps have run dry in New York City and in Dallas, Tex. I have before me a newspaper account of what happened when the taps ran dry in Emporia, Kans. This city of 15,000, a prosperous and thriving commercial center of the wheat country, suffered acute hardship and economic loss in 1957 when the municipal water supply proved to be inadequate. This newspaper account tells in detail how water shortage transformed the life of the community. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the end of my remarks the newspaper account entitled, "When a City Faces Drought," from the April 14, 1957, edition of the news magazine Parade. Happily, I am informed, vigorous action of the people of Emporia, with Federal assistance, has resulted in a program to prevent recurrence of their 1957 disaster.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit D.)

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, it is gratifying to contrast this unhappy case of drought disaster with the fine results that have been achieved by some communities. I learned recently of how the city of Springfield, Ohio, recognized the importance of water to its economic development. When Springfield dedicated its new waterworks, the Springfield News-Sun, the city's daily newspaper, published a special gala edition with many pages of complimentary advertising by the merchants and manufacturing establishments. One manufacturer, for example, paid for a full-page advertisement that stated, "Our future growth is limited only by the availability and purity of water." In the same issue, the Springfield Development Council told of the importance of water to that community. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks an excerpt from an article by Fred H. Krueckeberg, published in the Springfield, Ohio, News-Sun of October 12, 1958.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, adequate water supplies are crucial to the well-being and security of the Nation, and they are a major factor in the economic life and development of great sections of the country. This fact is recognized by the banks and financial institutions that are responsible for investment and monetary operations. As an example of this, the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City sponsors studies that are directed to evaluating whether, how, and when possible water shortages may limit economic development. An excellent summary of this problem is contained in the December 1958, Monthly Review of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks this paper, entitled "Water Availability—A National Problem."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Monthly Review, Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, December 1958]

WATER AVAILABILITY—A NATIONAL PROBLEM?

Water is, either directly or indirectly, a crucially important input in modern productive processes. Some economic activities—such as irrigation farming, petro-chemicals production, and mining—require huge quantities of water directly, very much as they use materials or fuel as input factors. Virtually all other productive activities require vast—and ever growing—quantities of water indirectly in various domestic and municipal uses. It is apparent, therefore, that limitations upon the amount of water available within an area may very well circumscribe its economic and demographic development. In recent years this fact has become a matter of great concern to many people in this country and especially to those residing in the arid and semiarid States of the West. If certain, relatively small, humid islands created by the high mountain ranges of the West are disregarded, it is correct to say that approximately the western half of this country has an average annual precipitation of less than 20 inches. More than one-half of the 10th Federal Reserve District lies in this low rainfall area.

However, the mere statement that less than a given number of inches of precipitation occurs in a certain area, without some other sort of referent, does not indicate whether the term "dry" may meaningfully be applied to an area. This is true because the adequacy of a given number of inches of moisture for various economic purposes will vary greatly from area to area depending upon, among other things, the rate at which moisture is absorbed into the atmosphere. Thus, one definition of a dry area is one in which potential evapotranspiration exceeds precipitation. This teminology may require some clarification. Evapotranspiration refers to the return of water to the atmosphere by evaporation from streams, soils, and ponds and by transpiration through the leaves of plants. Actual evapotranspiration is approximately the difference between precipitation and runoff. Potential evapotranspiration is a more complicated concept. It refers to the amount of evaporation and transpiration which would occur in an area if water were freely available. The actual transmission of water into the atmosphere from a heavily irrigated desert area approaches its potential evapotranspiration.[1]

According to this definition, over one-half of the United States and all of the district with the exception of the eastern portions of Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma, the portion of Missouri lying in the district, and limited high altitude areas in other States would be classified as having a dry climate. This fact is easily forgotten during periods when the rainfall cycle is in its upward phase and water appears plentiful. It becomes painfully evident, however, when the cycle turns downward as it has done with depressing regularity ever since the area was first settled. Problems of water shortage and issues concerning water conservation thus have a special immediacy to this district which spans the western Great Plains, termed by early historians of the area "The Great American Desert." Some of the problems concerning water use which occur in an area such as this are: (1) Does there appear to be reason to expect a limitation to economic development due to water shortage and how immediate is this limitation? (2) Is the structure of the economy evolving in a fashion which tends to make it more water using or less water using? (3) What uses of water would tend to yield the largest production for the area? (4) What uses of water would tend to be most effective in absorbing the potential population of the area? A beginning toward an answer to the first question is made in this article by reviewing some of the evidence concerning the water problem as it confronts the United States. Attention will be directed specifically to the problems of the district in forthcoming issues of the Review.

THE WATER PROBLEM IN THE UNITED STATES

The problem of water shortage as it may confront the United States in the foreseeable future is dealt with very briefly here, largely because only severely circumscribed conclusions can be drawn from a consideration of the entire country as an aggregate. The United States is so dissimilar in its rainfall and streamflow pattern as between different regions that a regional approach to the water problem is highly desirable. A generalized comparison of total water available to the United States and total requirements neglects the fact that unused runoff from certain basins (such as the Columbia) is almost bound to coexist with great stringency in the water supply elsewhere (such as in the Rio Grande Basin). Nevertheless, in a country with high labor and capital mobility such as the United States, an overall comparison is of some relevance and some of the concepts developed here will be useful later for a regional approach to the problem.

RAINFALL IN THE UNITED STATES

Considering the size of the land mass involved, the United States is relatively well endowed with water resources. A study made of the annual runoff from the various land areas of the world indicates that the water supplies of South and North America are potentially greater than in other continental areas.[2] This is reflected in the fact that by the definition adopted above, approximately one-half of the land area of the United States is wet, i.e., precipitation exceeds potential evapotranspiration. The average annual precipitation over the entire land area of the United States is about 30 inches, which is equivalent to about 4,300 billion gallons of water daily.

As has been suggested earlier, however, great variation exists in the rainfall pattern both on a monthly and geographical basis. The highest average annual precipitation recorded within the continental United States is 150.73 inches at Wynoochee, Wash., while the lowest is 1.66 inches at Greenland Ranch, California. Similarly, striking local variations in rainfall occur from year to year. Nevertheless, there is little evidence to indicate that the average annual precipitation falling on the land area of the United States is either increasing or decreasing over time. It is this precipitation upon which we must ultimately depend as the source of our sustainable water supply.

UNDERGROUND WATER AND THE SUSTAINABLE WATER SUPPLY

It will, of course, occur to the reader that underground water offers a large additional supply. The huge underground reservoirs which have been filled through the centuries and which underlie large areas of the United States do, in fact, contain vast quantities of water. Although inventories of ground water unfortunately are very incomplete, it has been estimated that these reservoirs now hold more water than the combined capacities of all lakes and surface reservoirs.[3] Nevertheless, the aquifers, or water-bearing strata, of these reservoirs are ultimately completely dependent upon rainfall for their recharge. If water is pumped from these reservoirs at a rate greater than their rate of recharge, "mining" of water occurs and the water table falls continuously. However, a falling water table does not necessarily indicate that water is being mined. In some cases, withdrawal may exceed recharge during drought periods and the situation be reversed during wet periods so that no mining takes place over the course of a rainfall cycle. Again the water bearing strata may be comparatively impermeable so that water moves through it relatively slowly. Under these conditions the water table will tend to fall in the wells after pumping commences but will tend to stabilize at a lower level as more water is induced to enter the pumping area, if the rate of withdrawal does not exceed the rate of recharge for the reservoir as a whole. Also, since the normal flow of a stream constitutes the overflow of a subterranean aquifer, pumping from wells may do nothing more than deplete the surface flow from the reservoir without continuously lowering the water table.

In fact, however, a number of areas already exist in the United States where serious and sustained depletion of the water stored in underground aquifers has taken place. The most important of these areas are in the Central and San Joaquin Valleys of California, south central Arizona, the High Plains of northwestern Texas and eastern New Mexico, and a relatively smaller area in eastern Arkansas. Probably the most notable of these areas are the San Joaquin Valley of California and the High Plains of Texas. An estimate made several years ago indicated that in the San Joaquin Valley alone, some 40,000 wells produce over 6 billion gallons of water per day (about one-fifth of all the ground water used in the Nation) with a daily overdraft in excess of 1 billion gallons. In the High Plains of Texas, the rate of withdrawal has been perhaps 25 times the rate of recharge. The total overdraft in the Southwest has been estimated to be approximately 5 billion gallons per day. If these areas of overdraft continue their current rates of underground water use, their economic development most assuredly will be adversely affected at some future time. Remedial measures to help balance draft against recharge have been taken in some areas. Such measures include spreading storm waters in recharge areas and pumping surface water into the aquifers through recharge wells. These techniques have been especially important in California and New York where actual or threatened incursion of saline, or salty, waters into aquifers has become a problem due to the lowering of water tables. Nevertheless, these measures are expensive and of limited efficacy.

It may be argued, however, that reasons similar to those given for mining our limited stocks of petroleum and other minerals could be used to justify the mining of water. Here, as in the case of other resources, we might rely upon developing technology to find substitutes or augment our supply. But it is important in this regard to note the monstrous quantities of water which our current standard of living requires. It is estimated that the annual average water use per person in the United States is about 1,500 tons. By contrast, the use of all other materials, such as food, fuel, metals, plastics, lumber, sand, and gravel, etc., amounts to a mere 18 tons. Thus, even if an efficient means of desalinating sea water were to become economically feasible in this country, tremendously high transportation costs would still exist to areas far inland where large water deficits occur.

The population of such areas presumably would need to become accustomed to radically different habits of water use than currently exist in the United States and water-using productive processes would undoubtedly be inhibited.

The amount of water which finds its way into the oceans by means of streamflow, therefore, is a good first approximation of the maximum permanently sustainable fresh water supply. Needless to say, this supply may be tapped at points either above or below the earth's surface. The difference between the amount of water deposited annually and total discharge from streams is accounted for primarily by natural evapotranspiration and consumptive use of water. The idea of evapotranspiration has been explained earlier in the article but the notion of consumptive use must now be explored briefly.

CONSUMPTIVE USES OF WATER

A consumptive use of water is one which actually precludes, through evapotranspiration or embodiment in a product, the use of that water by potential successive users. Consumptive use is distinguished from withdrawal, or diversion, which indicates the gross amount of water used as an input in some process. This concept of consumption is necessarily somewhat fuzzy, especially when applied to large land masses. Consumptive uses involve such activities as irrigation, rural and urban domestic water use, industrial and commercial water use, and steam-electric power. Uses of water for navigation, flood control, hydrogeneration of electric power, and recreation are usually not considered consumptive, although it should be noted that, to the extent that these uses require reservoir storage, some amount of evaporation should legitimately be attributed to them. Irrigation is probably the most consumptive of the major uses of water. It has been estimated that 20 to 60 percent of the water used in irrigation constitutes return flow, either by seepage into streams or percolation into aquifers. The proportion of the water diverted for irrigation purposes which does appear as return flow depends largely upon the rate of potential evapotranspiration in the area where the irrigation occurs. On the other hand, as much as 95 percent of municipal and industrial water reaches streams as sewage effluent. However, consumptive losses of municipal and industrial water ordinarily constitute a larger proportion of withdrawal in areas of water shortage than elsewhere because a larger proportion is used for cooling purposes and watering lawns.

As stated earlier, an average of approximately 4,300 billion gallons of water is deposited upon the United States daily.[4] Nearly 75 percent of this precipitation is returned to the atmosphere by the process of evapotranspiration. Much of this return to the atmosphere occurs through transpiration of plants and direct evaporation from bodies of water or moist earth. An additional large amount is lost due to various consumptive uses of water. Streamflow measurements of the Federal Geological Survery indicate that slightly in excess of 8 inches of the 30 inches average annual rainfall flows into the oceans through streams. This is the equivalent of about 1,145 billion gallons of water per day. This estimated quantity represents the maximum potential supply over and above current consumption and is equal to over four times the estimated total withdrawal—not consumption—for all irrigational, industrial, and municipal purposes in 1955.

Unfortunately, not all of this potential water supply can be realized. The greatest limitation occurs due to the fact that almost two-thirds of this streamflow is discharged into the oceans by streams at flood stage during comparatively short periods of time. Thus, according to the estimates of the U.S. Department of Commerce, less than one-third of this total streamflow is available during the greater part of the year. Consequently, use of this potential supply of water on a large scale is heavily dependent upon adequate storage facilities and a carefully regulated release of the flood water accumulated in them. It has been estimated that, by providing greater storage capacity to supplement the currently available dependable streamflow, it would be economically possible to provide future constant availability of 630 billion gallons daily of acceptable quality water, or approximately one-half of the measured total runoff. It is further estimated that probably half of this amount would have to be reserved for navigation and for the disposal of industrial and domestic wastes. This would leave a residual amount of about 315 billion gallons daily for consumption in irrigation, domestic, industrial, and farm uses, as compared with a present estimated consumption of about 115 billion gallons daily by those uses. If the present pattern of use and extent of reuse continues, total consumption by 1975 will reach a daily average of about 170 billion gallons.

On the face of it, this result appears very optimistic. It must be remembered, however, that the usefulness of a highly aggregative approach to a problem such as this is severely limited. The geographical structure of the water supply may be of such a nature as to conflict with social goals such as the diversification of industry, residence in climates offering superior amenities of life, and regional development. Obtaining water will also necessarily become more expensive as the limits of potential supply are approached and gathering problems become more severe. Also, the notion of consumption, as it is used in this article, does not take into account the heavily polluted nature of much of the water discharged by industrial and domestic users, because sewage effluent discharged into the Nation's streams almost necessarily reenters the available water supply. Nevertheless, industry faces severe waste disposal problems in certain areas and there is considerable social cost involved in turning many of the Nation's rivers into open sewers.

CONCLUDING COMMENT

When judged on the basis of aggregate supply and use data, it would appear that the water problem for the Nation as a whole is not severe. As has been pointed out, however, this approach neglects serious problems involved in the geographical distribution of water supplies. One example of this is the shortage of municipal and industrial water which has already manifested itself in a number of cities and led them to reach long distances for additional supplies. As is well known, Los Angeles obtains its city water (except for a relatively small amount coming from local wells) by means of aqueducts reaching across the breadth of California, and New York City obtains its supply (again with the exception of a small amount coming from local wells) from aqueducts extending into upper New York State. In the district States, Denver has found it necessary to tunnel through the mountains to the western slope of the Rockies for part of its water supply. Also a canal reaching southeast from Oklahoma City, which would carry water to that city from three reservoirs in southeastern Oklahoma, has been proposed. As the population of the district increases, other cities may face a similar situation. A more comprehensive discussion of the district water supply and its possible future effects on economic development in the area will appear in a future issue of the Review.

EXCERPT FROM "THE CHALLENGE TO AMERICA: ITS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL ASPECTS"—A SPECIAL STUDIES REPORT OF THE ROCKEFELLER BROS. FUND, 1958

NATURAL RESOURCES

Any serious effort to project our growth potential for the future must take account of our supply of natural resources. These are the bone and sinew of our economy, upon which all else, domestic and international, depends. * * *

Here, the challenge to innovation and inventive thinking is immense. New technologies, more efficient extraction processes, new uses may open up new worlds. Even now we can discern the outlines of a future in which, through the use of the split atom, our resources, both of power and raw materials, will be limitless. But the theoretically possible is not yet within our grasp. Pending the necessary scientific and technological breakthroughs, we must face the fact that our supplies are not inexhaustible.

One resource which we must actively conserve is water. Already, demand is outrunning our supply in some areas and thus placing a limit on growth. In the last half-century the number of water users in American cities has doubled, while their use of water has increased fivefold. By 1975 the increase in our population, coupled with the growth of industries which require large quantities of water, will more than double the current rate of water consumption. The enormous amounts required by industry are illustrated by the fact that it requires 300,000 gallons of water to manufacture 1 ton of rayon, and the rayon industry in the United States turns out 600,000 tons of rayon a year. The Nation's water problem, already serious in important areas, may well become, in the next 10 to 15 years, one of the most difficult issues facing our economy.

A solution depends partly on tapping new water sources, partly on more coordinated policies to bring about the more efficient use and reuse of existing resources, and partly on better protection of watersheds and reservoirs. The industrial use of water, which accounts for 30 percent of the total, can be greatly economized: modern steel mills use only one-quarter as much water per ton of steel as those built 20 years ago. In agriculture, as well, more efficient techniques can stretch water use. In the arid regions of the West, where losses through evaporation account for as much as 50 percent of the total water in reservoirs, experiments are being conducted on means to minimize such losses by use of thin surface films and by use of floating covers.

Of even greater immediate urgency than an improved water technology is the need for institutions to manage and coordinate the development and use of water. The problems of the Connecticut River and the Colorado River are neither so similar that they can be easily handled by a single agency, nor so localized that each can be adequately dealt with solely at the State level. Typically, water problems are regional problems, and often can best be dealt with by specifically designed public agencies. The Port of New York Authority's handling of regional transportation problems is an example. In addition to these regional bodies, a degree of national policy formation and coordination, possibly centralized in one Federal agency, is essential for such nationwide problems as water pollution, and for research into technological problems of water conservation.

Whereas adequate supplies of water of acceptable quality are essential to the continued welfare of the Nation, to its agricultural and industrial development, and to the national security; and

Whereas authoritative estimates forecast that by 1980 the United States population will increase to 250,000,000 and that the use of water will have increased by more than 50 per centum; and

Whereas in many sections of the United States such additional supplies of water of suitable quality are available, if at all, only at costs that would impede or prevent the increasing uses needed by the expanding population, agriculture, and industry; and

Whereas adequate provision for wildlife and recreational values, as well as provision of adequate quantity and quality of water supplies, and the economic utilization of hydroelectric and navigation potentials, stream sanitation, and other water resource benefits requires coordination of all such prospective uses and developments by public and private agencies; and

Whereas there are many new technical methods that may increase the usable water supplies by means of weather modification, evaporation reduction, desalination, seepage control, waste-water salvage, application of nuclear energy, and similar improvements; and

Whereas the Senate, in connection with provision for needed development and coordination of water resources, desires to have recommendations relative to the needed programs, their character and timing in relation to population and economic use requirements and associated benefits such as wildlife and recreation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That there shall be established a committee which shall make exhaustive studies of the extent to which water resources activities in the United States are related to the national interest, and the extent and character of water resource activities, both governmental and nongovernmental, that can be expected to be required to provide the quantity and quality of water for use by the population, agriculture, and industry between the present time and 1980, along with suitable provision for related recreational and fish and wildlife values, to the end that such studies and the recommendations based thereon may be available to the Senate in considering water resources policies for the future.

SEC. 2. (a) The committee shall be composed of 3 members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, 3 members of the Committee on Public Works, and 2 members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

(b) Any vacancy in the membership of the committee shall not affect its powers, and any vacancy in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as provided for determining the original membership.

(c) Five members of the committee shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 3. The committee shall, without limiting the scope of the study hereby authorized, direct its attention to the following matters:

(a) The character and extent of water resource projects that will be needed to be in operation between the present time and 1980 in order to supply the water use requirements of population, agriculture, and industry, including but not limited to navigation development and hydroelectric power generation, and with appropriate provision for flood control, and the realization of recreational and wildlife values.

(b) The character of legislation that may encourage the adoption of new technical methods and improved process for increasing the usefulness of available water resources, including but not limited to weather modification, evaporation reduction, desalination of saline and brackish waters, seepage control, waste-water salvage, and the application of nuclear energy.

SEC. 4. The committee shall transmit to the Senate not later than January 31, 1961, the results of the study herein authorized together with such recommendations as may at that time be found desirable.

SEC. 5. In the conduct of this study full use shall be made of the experience, knowledge, and advice of private organizations, schools, institutions, and individuals. The committee may divide the work among such groups and institutions as it may deem appropriate and may enter into contracts for this purpose. Full use shall be made of studies and plans prepared by executive agencies, and such agencies are requested to give the committee or any of its authorized study groups or consultants such assistance as may be required.

SEC. 6. (a) For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to employ on a temporary basis through January 31, 1961, such technical, clerical or other assistants, experts and consultants as it deems desirable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $_____, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee. The chairman may designate one or more members who may act for him as the purpose of this resolution.

(b) For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such places and times, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and to make such expenditures, as it deems desirable. The committee shall cease to exist at the close of business on January 31, 1961.

THE DAY THE TAPS RUN DRY

(By Robert and Leona Rienow)

Water—our most carelessly wasted resource—is fast becoming our most precious one. Already it sets the limits for growth of many cities and industries * * * and nobody is yet doing anything effective to prevent a real catastrophe about 20 years from now.

If there is one thing which the ordinary American city-dweller never thinks about from one end of the year to the other, it is water. He turns on the tap, and water pours; he turns off the tap incompletely, and it drips; he flushes the toilet, and it roars. Ever so often, some politician or city planner makes a speech warning people not to waste water, but nobody pays much attention. To most Americans today, pure, palatable water in unlimited quantities is a kind of birthright, like citizenship, and not even the Supreme Court can ever take it away.

No following generation of Americans is ever likely to share this luxurious attitude. We are rapidly running out of good water. More than a thousand cities and towns already have been forced to curtail their water service. Near Chicago, where artesian wells flowed under their own pressure a hundred years ago, new wells must go down 2,000 feet to reach the water table. Dallas is already pumping the salt-tainted Red River into its mains, and New York faces the likelihood that eventually it will have to purify the polluted Hudson to slake its growing thirst. In Mississippi, wells are now 400 feet deeper, on the average, than they were only 10 years ago. Denver, eager for new industry, has been turning away manufacturers whose production processes involve a heavy use of water.

All along the Atlantic coast, as the water table falls, the ocean is pushing in to the underground reservoirs. In Dade County, around Miami, high salt content in the wells threatens the crops on irrigated farms. Inland, oil-field brines often seep into the deep wells. Marianna, Ark., tastes salt when it turns on the tap, and one Texas community was forced to drill three dozen new wells in a single year. When headwaters are piped off to the reservoirs, the rivers fall: in the summer of 1957 swimmers waded across the Delaware at the point where General Washington took his famous ferry ride.

WHERE IT ALL GOES

A large, rich suburb of New York has already experienced the ultimate horror. On October 29, 1957, the city reservoir of Orange, N.J., became a muddy hole; and two days later, one of the city's four artesian wells ran dry. Orange turned desperately to the State of New Jersey for help, which was forthcoming—but only after the city had pledged to reduce its consumption by 500,000 gallons a day.

Water shortages, obviously, can be caused by either of two things: too much consumption or too little supply. Both are operating in America today. Our demand for water is increasing at a fantastic rate, and we are channeling our resources to meet our needs at far less than maximum efficiency.

According to the latest report from the U.S. Geological Survey, our farms, homes, and factories are drawing 240 billion gallons a day from the Nation's streams, reservoirs, and underground storage. Of the total, roughly 10 percent goes into homes for drinking, washing, and sprinkling the lawn. The rest is divided more or less equally between farms and factories.

Sixty years ago, the average household used 90 gallons of water per head each day. Today we have 35 million bathrooms, we buy millions of dish washers and washing machines, air conditioners, and automatic lawn sprinklers—and the per capita use of water has risen to 148 galons a day. El Centro, Calif., which would be miserably uncomfortable without air conditioning (summer temperatures rise to 115 degrees) holds the world's record for domestic water use—600 gallons a person a day. And while consumption per capita goes up, our population is rapidly rising, currently at the rate of 3 million a year.

The increase in domestic water consumption, however, is small beside the growing thirst of commerce. American industry now uses 110 billion gallons of water a day—11 times as much as it used in 1900, and almost half again as much as it used in 1952.

Nearly all manufacturing requires some water, and many processes demand amazing amounts. A new oil refinery in Delaware takes in as much water as a city of 2 million people. Each ton of paper drinks 65,000 gallons. Steam plants for producing electric power consume 91 gallons for every kilowatt-hour sent out on the lines. Gunpowder costs 100 gallons of water a pound.

With the depletion of high-grade iron ores in the Mesabi Range of Minnesota, the emphasis is shifting to taconite processing, a procedure which demands 3 times the water used at present in that district. And the new plastic and atomic industries are the worst water hogs of all. By 1975, unless manufacturers cut down their water consumption, our factories alone will tap 275 billion gallons a day—if they can find it.

On the farms, irrigation canals and pipelines are stretching out farther every year. Some 34 million acres of farmland in this country are artificially watered by one means or another, and the practice is rapidly spreading from the dry West—where irrigation has reclaimed great stretches of previously useless land—to the more humid East. Recurrent droughts in eastern farm areas since the war, plus the development of more efficient pumping equipment and lightweight pipes, have led to a fourfold increase in the amount of irrigated land on the Atlantic side of the Mississippi. In Indiana, where there were less than 5,000 acres of irrigated land in 1950, there are now 25,000, and farm experts foresee an increase to 80,000 by 1965.

In the West, too, more and more water is being demanded of the earth. In 1941, 420,000 acre-feet of water were pumped out of the ground in Santa Cruz Valley, Ariz.; by 1949, withdrawals had reached the rate of 1,250,000 acre-feet a year. (An acre-foot is the amount of water necessary to cover 1 acre to a depth of 1 foot.) During this period, rainfall replenished the underground reservoirs at the rate of only 215,000 acre-feet a year. On the high plains of Texas, men are pumping up the underground water reserves 20 times as fast as nature can replenish them. To this kind of arithmetic, there must be an end.

HOW RESERVOIRS ARE RUINED

We have long ceased to live on our water "income"—the annual rainfall. Today we are drawing heavily on our water "capital," the underground reservoirs built up by natural processes over thousands of years.

In fact, of course, the situation is not so hopeless as the statement sounds. Our water income actually far exceeds our needs—if only we could channel all of it to our spigots. The average daily rainfall onto the United States is considerably more than the 240 billion gallons we withdraw. But most of that rainfall runs off to the sea without ever passing through a water main.

Water is available for our use only during that relatively brief time between its fall from the heavens and its arrival in the oceans. The more rapidly it runs off, the less of it we have.

Forested watersheds hold great quantities of rainfall—an inch of water in every 4 inches of humus—and release it slowly to the streams and rivers and underground reservoirs. Cutover forest land holds little water; the rainfall runs off it quickly, in soil-destroying, gulley-digging torrents.

We have already sheared off most of the 822 million acres of virgin forest we found in this country, destroying the sponge-like forest floor which held back the runoff. And the suicidal process continues. Some large timber and paper companies today practice a highly publicized form of good forestry on their own lands, but many of these still overcut the small farmer's woodlot or timberland, let to them on contract. Dr. McArdle of the U.S. Forest Service classifies most of today's cutting as far from good.

Water is held for future use not only by the "plant robe" which normally covers the ground, but also by certain natural reservoirs, especially swamps and marshes. Here, again, we have been abusing our heritage. More than 82 million acres of swamps have been drained for farmland, and millions more have been covered over with housing developments. Springs and creeks have been bulldozed out of existence.

Another kind of natural reservoir is the aquifer—an underground deposit of rain water which has, through the course of ages, seeped through the soil and porous stone until it is trapped by an impervious layer of rock. Some aquifers are like oilfields; they can be tapped by wells—and once drained, the water cannot be replenished within any foreseeable period. Others are like great liquid lungs, breathing water both in and out; they soak up the surface moisture and release it gradually to streams and rivers—thus helping to keep the flow of our water courses relatively stable.

This complex system is being interfered with nearly everywhere in the United States, with results that are as dangerous as they are hard to see. Many aquifers are being drained faster than they can be replenished. Elsewhere the natural supply of water to these underground storage tanks is being curtailed—by new highways, parking lots, airfields, and other construction which is spreading over hundreds of thousands of acres. It isn't possible to recharge a water table through six inches of concrete. An overgrazed pasture or cut over forest, where the rainfall runs off immediately instead of soaking in, starves the underground reservoirs in much the same way.

In a few localities, as we have shown, so much fresh water has been pumped out of the ground that it has, in effect, left one of those vacuums which nature traditionally abhors. As a result, salt water has crept in from the sea, through deep-buried layers of porous sand or rock—and wells in some parts of California and along the Atlantic coast have begun to pump worse-than-useless brine.

Most of us, of course, still depend for the greater part of our water on surface streams, rather than the vaults of the aquifers. But it has been an immemorial habit of human beings not only to drink out of streams, but also to dump their sewage and other wastes in the same place. This was tolerable so long as the country was sparsely settled—but today it has become so crowded that virtually all of our streams are polluted to the point where they are suspect for human consumption unless chemically treated. Already many Americans are drinking what may be accurately—if disgustingly—described as treated sewage.

WHERE IT CAN BE SAVED

Damage done over a century cannot be repaired in a year or two. Even the most immediate, thorough, and expensive national water program would not deliver its benefits for 10 to 20 years. Since we have no such program—Washington hasn't yet begun even to draft one—we must resign ourselves to at least a generation of relative water shortage in the land of plenty.

There are palliatives, very well in their place, so long as we do not regard them as solutions. We can drastically reduce water waste by consumers. Peeping Tom statisticians say that we use three times as much water as we really need for our morning shower. Leaky taps, which account for 20 percent of domestic water waste, could be made a misdemeanor punishable by a stiff fine. One modern luxury we can easily do without is the private swimming pool in the backyard; lots of us may be able to afford it economically, but hydrologically it is too expensive.

Water engineers are unanimous in their opinion that both waste and consumption would decline sharply if households and factories had to pay for their water by the gallon, rather than on the usual franchise basis. Water rates should be eliminated everywhere from the general real estate tax package, and meters should be installed to measure and charge for water according to the amount used.

On the farm, too, water economies can be achieved. Open irrigation ditches lose water through seepage, vegetation along the banks, and the inevitable evaporation. Water is saved wherever pipes are substituted for ditches. Out in the range area, where water is scarcest, underground reservoirs are being drained needlessly, either to establish prior use under western laws, or as part of ill-advised reclamation projects.

Industry, however—which is guilty of the greatest waste—could accomplish the greatest savings. Steel mills require, on an average, 65,000 gallons of water to make a ton of steel; but in California, where water is tight, the inappropriately named Fontana Mills have learned to make do with 1,000 gallons per ton. Again, steam generating plants ordinarily use 91 gallons for each kilowatt-hour of electricity produced, but powerplants in areas hard pressed for water turn out the same current with one-tenth the water consumption.

Most industrial use does not pollute water to the point where it must be poured out to sea. Many factories could reuse over and over again much of the water that goes through their pipes. Even sea water can be used in certain operations, and a Texas refinery has contracted with the city of Amarillo for a supply of used water from the sewage disposal plant.

As yet, however, only one-tenth of 1 percent of the water used by industry is reclaimed sewage. Literally billions of gallons of safe, pure water could be saved every day, if industry would where possible content itself with water good enough for factories, but not good enough for human beings.

On the supply side, too, temporary improvements can be wangled from nature. Where the aquifer has been contaminated with salt water, artificial recharging may keep the wells in business for a few more years. It may eventually be possible to recharge some depleted underground reservoirs by the diversion of floodwaters—though no such experiment has yet fully succeeded, despite many theoretical discussions in hydraulic engineering journals. Cloud seeding may enable us to divert to the land some of the rain that now falls on the ocean. River pollution can and should be reduced. And, of course, great dams, artificial reservoirs, and aqueducts will keep increasing our apparent supply of water. Dramatic as they are, however, surface reservoirs make poor substitutes for natural subterranean storage vaults; evaporation loss is high, and silt accumulates rapidly, cutting down the storage capacity.

If the day ever comes when nuclear energy can provide cheap power in unlimited quantities, we may be able to handle our water problems by distilling sea water or by irradiating great quantities of sewage. But neither of these alternatives is currently practical—or pleasant to think about, at best. Indeed, they may well create more sinister situations than they solve.

WHO HAS TO DO WHAT

There is only one way to avoid a water crisis in the coming years: a national water policy carried out on all levels of government, and including new measures of reforestation and conservation. We must slow down that part of the water cycle between the cloud and the sea, during which water is available to us. We must regulate our water use instead of merely supplying water to all and sundry on a catch-as-catch-can basis.

Experiments have verified the long-term value of reforestation. In the White Hollow watershed of Tennessee the Forest Service permitted 1,700 acres of badly treated land to revert to nature. Where the land was gullied, the Service planted trees. Fifteen years later, severe summer storms no longer started torrents rushing down the hillside. Instead, the water flowed off evenly, at one-tenth the speed. The total amount of water coming down from the hillside after a 1-inch summer rainfall was the same—but the streams ran full for 10 times as many days.

Every protected swamp, every untouched woods, every revived forest adds to the water-holding capacity of the land. And the land cover can be made more efficient by sound watershed engineering—building a small reservoir in an upland hollow, controlling a disintegrating gully, dredging rivers, constructing floodways, stabilizing stream banks, creating a peaceful rather than a violent landscape.

Such engineering has already begun under the Watershed Protection and Flood Control Acts of 1954 and 1956. These laws give the Federal Soil Conservation Service a modest budget for technical advice and assistance to local groups planning watershed improvements. But a great deal more legislation will be necessary before Federal help is really an important factor in water-short areas.

At present, no fewer than 25 different Federal agencies deal with some phase of the water problem—flood control, reclamation, navigation, water pollution, and so forth. All of them do valuable work, but each operates independently, with its eye on its own specialized chore. No agency in the Federal Government is concerned with water policy as a whole; indeed, the Federal Government historically has shown little concern over the total quantity of water available to homes, farms, and factories. We need, first of all, an act of Congress establishing a national water policy, and perhaps an independent agency to turn that policy into a program.

Even the most rigorous national policy, however, will leave most of the actual work of water conservation and control to the State governments. A few of them are already busy on the job, most notably California, where the crush of population threatens a water calamity. California's master plan, which contemplates a population of 40 million, calls for the construction of 200 reservoirs and an aqueduct system, the entire project to cost $8.6 billion at current prices. Iowa and Pennsylvania, too, have assumed statewide authority over water development, and New York has reserved a State veto power over all new water systems. (New York also has vast State forest preserves protecting its main watersheds.)

Often, several States draw water from the same river basin. Today they squabble with each other about their withdrawal rights—the dispute between Arizona and California over the water in the Colorado River is a recurrent feature of the Supreme Court calendar. Eventually, however, they will have to learn to work with each other, to protect the watersheds and safeguard the joint supply. Incodel, which administers the Delaware River and its headwaters, is a functioning example of what the States—in this case, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania—can accomplish together once they understand their joint interests.

Meanwhile, the municipalities, cities, towns, and villages, must recognize their obligations. Water supply is a regional, not a local problem. There can be little progress in water planning so long as every incorporated entity seeks out its own private waterhole. Under the supervision of State authorities, whole clusters of communities should be planning, building, and operating their common water supply systems.

Cooperation, supervision, and control are the key words. On every level, there must be a stop to the haphazard hijacking of convenient water. Until we learn to ignore artificial boundaries—to see that the watershed, not the user community, is the central element—we cannot hope to plan a future free of water shortages.

WHAT HAPPENED IN THE SAHARA

In a few areas, water scarcity is already a hindrance to progress. Plans to process oil-shale deposits in Colorado may well founder for lack of water. Out on the edges of the great western range, the desert creeps further into the grassland every year.

Most communities, though, have scarcely felt the pinch as yet. There is no great hardship, after all, in a temporary ordinance—common, these days, in eastern cities—which forbids people to water their lawns except after dark. But these bits and pieces of municipal law foreshadow a cramped future, unless we act sensibly and soon to avoid a real crisis.

Led by Dr. Paul Sears, of Yale, ecologists have been warning us for years about the danger to civilization inherent in a falling water table. There are ancient waterworks under the Sahara. Among the greatest monuments left behind by the dead nations of antiquity are the aqueducts—notably in Italy, Spain, and the Middle East—which multiplied as a failing civilization outgrew its water supplies. Our ingenuity has stripped the ground cover and dried the land infinitely faster than our ancestors could manage such destruction. We must now use that ingenuity to conserve and restore the balance of nature.

Without such ingenuity, without a well-financed, well-conceived national water program, we will inevitably drink our way into a water famine. And it will be too late to plan America's future on the day the taps run dry.

EXHIBIT D

WHEN A CITY FACES DROUGHT

(By Sid Ross)

Just like you, perhaps, residents of this central Kansas city used to throw away water as if it were money. But more recently, water has been prayed over here, watched for, guarded like treasure. In some families a single panful has been used to rinse dishes, reheated to wash the next batch, heated again to scrub floors—and finally poured on parched plants.

Emporia's water-savers, and other townsfolk in the Great Plains, are the unsung victims of the area's 6-year drought. Much has been written about the dust-blown fields. (Surprisingly, farmers near here gathered a good wheat crop last year, thanks more to timing of rain than amount.) Little, however, has been said about the problems of the dried-up towns.

Yet in many ways the town problem is more ominous for the rest of the United States than dust clouds in the Wheat Bowl. Emporia is not yet a parched desert where people gasp "Water." Its 15,000 residents suffer mostly from annoyance, inconvenience, and indignity. But Emporia today could be your town tomorrow.

Although the United States has plenty of water, it is badly distributed or poorly used. A recent survey showed scanty supplies in one-fourth of the country—including such well-watered areas as New Jersey and Ohio. The survey's importance was dramatized by California's recent announcement of a $1.6 billion water-development program, biggest State construction project in United States history.

Only a few towns have been hit as hard as Emporia. (A few, smaller, have been hit harder.) But once—probably like your town today—Emporia considered its supply plentiful. Today, not even normal rainfall (and rainfall has been off one-third) would help much. "We need real cloudbursts, gully-washers, running rains," says Ted McDaniel of the Emporia Gazette.

Remember a hot summer recently when your city clamped down on lawn-sprinkling and car-washing? In Emporia, either is a punishable offense. Streets are filled with dusty cars, and lawns are only a memory. Hundreds of stately old elms, once the town's pride, have died. These are the visible scars.

The invisible scars go deeper. They spring from the indignities of voluntary restriction, and they center in the home. Emporians voluntarily bathe just once a week, wash clothes once a week, even economize on flushing toilets.

"We can't afford to be proud any more," says one housewife. "In some ways we're living almost like animals." To put teeth in the voluntary campaign, the city administration has quadrupled water rates. Consumption has been cut almost in half.

Emporians still joke through their gripes. "These days," one barber cracked to Parade, "you can smell your friends before you see them." A favorite story involves a man who kept a tub underneath a rain gutter to catch the few showers and melting snow from the roof. One Saturday night it was stolen. "The thief," the punchline goes, "made a clean getaway."

To housewives, the famine is scarcely a laughing matter. They bear the brunt of it. With restrictions, an automatic washer, for instance, becomes an absolute nightmare.

"You have to wait and wash everything in one day," Mrs. Lucille Foncannon explained to Parade. "You fill the machine and let the clothes wash. Then you stop the cycle and dip the water out with pans. Then you spin the clothes dry and take them out. Then you pour the water back and put in another load. Then you do the same thing for the rinse."

Mrs. Foncannon is 33, but she feels older after a washday. She sighs wearily, "You can't get anything else done. You have to be there to stop the machine. Then you have to be carrying water—back and forth, back and forth."

The frills and niceties have suffered most. The Foncannons have given up linen napkins and tablecloths. Mrs. Foncannon changes one sheet each week instead of two. In September the family used 8,900 gallons of water; last month they used 1,500.

FIVE PEOPLE, TWO BATHS

Parade spent a day watching them scrimp. It began when Bob Foncannon shaved in cold water—"You can't let it run until it's hot, or you waste it." It ended with the weekly bath: Bob and Stephen, 9, used one tubful; Mrs. Foncannon, Catherine, 6, and Janet, 3, the other. As the restrictions ask, they used only 4 inches of water.

Between times the housewife waded through an unending round of drudgery, almost like 100 years ago. "The simplest chore, like defrosting the refrigerator, becomes a wearying, drawn-out process," she says. "You have to heat water to melt the ice and so on. It takes a whole morning."

Dishes are saved and washed all at once, rinsed in a pan instead of scalded under a faucet. Then the rinse water is carefully saved. Once in a while, when a light shower strikes, everyone dashes out to scrub his sidewalk. This is a real break, since scrubbing a porch with city water means a $50 fine.

About the only people in town who like the drought—in some ways—are children. Young Stephen Foncannon points out he never cared for bathing anyway. "We have a real problem with our 18-month-old," says Laymon Brooks, a student at Kansas State Teachers College. "We try to save diapers for a week, but—frankly—they smell." In Emporia, such topics are no longer taboo. A housewives' kaffeeklatsch is apt to thrash out the problem of when to flush a toilet.

"This bathing once a week is all right for boys," one school girl told Parade, "but girls are still supposed to be dainty." At Christmas, the suggestion was frequently heard, "Buy your girl perfume and help solve the water shortage." Druggists say sales of deodorants, perfumes and air fresheners have skyrocketed. So have soft drinks and milk. A few supermarkets are selling bottled spring water, since water from the Cottonwood River, part of the present supply, must be heavily treated and has a sour taste.

A few service stations with wells wash cars. They charge almost double the former rate. "We had to increase the price," says one proprietor. "We have to go get water and haul it here and heat it." A few people also wash their cars in the stagnant pools of the Cottonwood, which hasn't flowed since August.

Along the Cottonwood and Neosho Rivers, a few diehards still fish. Almost more than anything else, men grumble about what drought has done to recreation. "I like to lie in a hot tub and soak the tiredness out and think about fishing," says one trucker. "Now I can't take a hot bath, and I can't fish."

Game has wandered off in search of water. Golf courses are baked hard, and most golfers have given up. Dead and decaying fish choke the rivers and Lake Kahola—or where the rivers and lake once were.

Lake Kahola was Emporia's ace in the hole. Built after the drought of the 1930's, it was to trap the Neosho headwaters and insure the town against future droughts. Like many towns in the United States, Emporia felt secure with this big reserve.

But also like many towns, Emporia failed to realize that new gadgets—automatic washers, air conditioners, dishwashers—demanded water. Nor did people notice they were using more water for everything. Then drought struck. The level of Kahola and in the rivers fell lower and lower.

This January the city played its ace. Kahola's gates were opened. The last trickle of water passed to reservoirs downstream. With luck, this supply will last until mid-May. Even with normal rainfall, it will take 2 years to refill the lake.

A number of Emporians have exercised their American prerogative to snipe at city hall. The city, they feel, should have seen that Emporia was better protected. But most people lay the dry spell to chance. "Who could have foreseen 6 straight years with almost no rain?" one asks.

And they hope it won't happen again. Emporia now is refurbishing another dam on the Cottonwood. Many leaders, however, think the problem beyond the scope of a single city. Maybe it rightfully belongs to the State, or a group of States, or Washington.

Recently, Kansas Congressmen introduced a resolution asking Federal agencies to help with the State's water problem. And two big dams have been authorized. But to some residents this smacks of putting all your eggs in one basket; they want a chain of small dams substituted.

Others feel the answer is a giant pipeline from the Great Lakes, as suggested by Dr. Gustave Egloff of Chicago. Such a line would supply millions of gallons a day at an initial cost of $100,000 a mile, obviously a project for several States.

A few look at the problem in its broadest sense. After all, they say, the United States has plenty of water; only 15 percent of the supply is used. Perhaps all of America—Emporia and the dry towns, the well-watered East and your town—should examine the problem and try to spread more evenly what's already there.

Meanwhile, Emporia flirts with stopgaps. Talk has been bandied around about a pipeline to the Kaw River, 60 miles and $1½ million away. Emporians look fearfully at nearby towns that import water by tank cars, at $30 a month a family.

NEXT: "WATERLEGGERS"?

One town wag has predicted "waterlegging," and a few pessimists believe it may come to that. Emporians worry about fire, which would clean out the supply, and disease, because they fear the sewers aren't being flushed often enough.

Already the city admits its program to attract industry is dead. "What industry will consider a town that can't guarantee water?" But most people feel rain will come before real misery sets in. Emporians insist they are not really suffering. "It's just this annoyance, this living in the past," says one man.

But some people feel that the annoyances, continued much longer, will leave a mark that can't be erased. No one has fled Emporia yet. Practically the whole town is cooperating with voluntary restriction; only one woman has been fined $40 for washing her car with city water. But just occasionally you hear flashes of grumbling about old 'Soandso," who takes a bath every night and says nuts to restrictions. It is this brother-against-brother bickering that Emporia fears more than drought.

"It's life or death now for Emporia," says McDaniel. "If we don't get rain—real rain—I don't know what we'll do." No one in Emporia knows.

OFFICIAL OUTLINES WATER'S IMPORTANCE IN INDUSTRY

(By Ferd H. Krueckeberg)

The domination of water over all forms of life is evident throughout history. As the population of the Nation expands, the demand for water increases, not only because the per capita requirements increase but particularly because of the increased need of water for agricultural and industrial purposes. For example:

In areas where farmers must irrigate, it is found that it takes 6,250 gallons of water to produce 1 bushel of corn, and for a bushel of wheat it takes 7,500 gallons of water.

In industry we find these needs: 470 gallons to produce a barrel of beer; 770 gallons to refine a barrel of petroleum; 3,600 gallons to produce a ton of coke from coal; 6,000 gallons to generate one kilowatt hour; 50,000 gallons to test an airplane engine; 65,000 gallons to make a ton of steel; 200,000 gallons to produce a ton of viscose rayon; 320,000 gallons to produce a ton of aluminum; 600,000 gallons to produce a ton of synthetic rubber, and 5 million gallons to produce a ton of bromine.

Other specific requirements are: The manufacture of an automobile weighing 1½ tons takes 400 tons of water. It takes 5 gallons of water to make 1 quart of motor oil. It takes 80 gallons of water to heat an electric iron for 1 hour. It takes 60 gallons of water to can 1 bushel of tomatoes.

New industrial techniques, including the harnessing of atomic power and the production of synthetic fuels, require more and more water.

In many industries the problem of securing sufficient quantity of usable water at reasonable rates is a pressing one. In fact, water supply is a prerequisite in site selection in steel, paper pulp, paper board, wool scouring, food and chemical processes.

The dispersal of industry into semi-rural areas has revived keen interest all across the Nation in the study of water supplies. Prudent investigators for growth industries will determine the quantity, quality, and cost of water through their research. They advise us that the necessity of finding a water supply that does not require extensive conditioning is important. High pressure and low pressure steam are important throughout industry in general, particularly in chemicals and food industries, paper and textile finishing. Large amounts of cooling water are required in the manufacture of iron and steel, in metal processes, and in modern plants using air conditioning and other refrigeration devices.

Water is a most important item for industry. No other common substance is so peculiarly suited to industrial needs. Not only is water capable of removing heat from objects, it also conversely has a greater heat-treating capacity than any other common property.

Ohio uses 15 billion kilowatt hours of electricity annually. This requires a stupendous volume of water—1,200 billion gallons, a quantity that would fill a reservoir a mile wide and 10 miles long to a depth of 57 feet. Seven billion gallons of water a day is the combined volume of the industries in Ohio.

It must be evident that water is a determining factor in industrial development. Springfield has not only done something about the problem of water shortage, they have done the job of going all the way to have the best supply of quality water in the entire State of Ohio. Now we have favorable recommendations from the Ohio State Department of Health, who in 1950 announced they had advised against new industry moving to Springfield because of the inadequacy of the water system.

In the spring of 1950 a vast underground reservoir of water in the Springfield area was discovered. Investigation showed that the Mad River Valley is probably the best water-producing area in the State. Here now was the challenge and opportunity for Springfield.

It is to the credit of the citizenry of Springfield that they had the courage of their convictions and planned with soundness and determination to eliminate the water problem for generations ahead.

Teamed with this development comes now a new spirit, a desire for yet a finer city. This spirited plan was captured and written into a "Blueprint For Progress," authored by our capable city commission and endorsed at the polls by the voters.

The manufacturer who wishes to set up shop in the most favorable circumstances will do well to look to Springfield, Ohio.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON TRAINING AND STRENGTHENING OF RESERVE FORCES

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report on the status of training of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and the progress made in strengthening of the Reserve components, during the fiscal year 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

APPROVAL OF CERTAIN ARMED FORCES PROJECTS

A letter from the Acting Secretary of Defense, reporting, pursuant to law, that approval had been given for extension of a runway at the Ontario Municipal Airport, Ontario, Calif., and the restoration of a pier, Naval Reserve Training Center, Baltimore, Md.; to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT ON HELIUM-PRODUCTION FUND

A letter from the Administrative Assistant Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, on the Helium-Production Fund, for the fiscal year 1958; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PROPOSED DONATION BY NAVY DEPARTMENT OF BOAT TO CITY OF BOSTON

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Material), reporting, pursuant to law, that the Department of the Navy proposes to donate a 63-foot aircraft rescue boat to the Police Department, City of Boston; to the Committee on Armed Services.

STATISTICAL SUPPLEMENT TO STOCKPILE REPORT

A letter from the Director, Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, a secret statistical supplement to the stockpile report for the period ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF SELECTIVE SERVICE

A letter from the Director, Selective Service System, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, his report on operations of the Selective Service System, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

AUDIT REPORT ON EXCHANGE STABILIZATION FUND

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Exchange Stabilization Fund, for the period July 1, 1957, to June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

INTEREST RATE ON VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION GUARANTEED LOANS

A letter from the Administrator, Veterans' Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend chapter 37 of title 38, United States Code, to increase the authority of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to prescribe the interest rate on Veterans' Administration guaranteed loans (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CHARTER ACT

A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the District of Columbia an appointed Governor and secretary, and an elected legislative assembly and nonvoting Delegate to the House of Representatives, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1910 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ABOLISHMENT OF OFFICE OF REGISTER OF THE TREASURY

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to abolish the Office of Register of the Treasury (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE RELATING TO PREVENTION OF EXCESSIVE DEPLETION ALLOWANCES

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending pro certain legislation as an amendment of the Internal Revenue Code, relating to the prevention of excessive depletion allowances; to the Committee on Finance.

REPORT ON REVIEW OF ARMY SIGNAL CORPS SUPPLY OPERATIONS, ORLEANS, FRANCE

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the review of Army Signal Corps Supply Operations, U.S. Army, Europe Communications Zone, Orleans, France, dated January 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

CONTRACTS FOR CERTAIN CLEANING AND CUSTODIAL SERVICES

A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to authorize the Administrator of General Services to make contracts for cleaning and custodial services for periods not exceeding 5 years (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Government Operations.

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF, EXPENDITURES BY, AND DONATIONS TO ANTHRACITE EXPERIMENT STATION, SCHUYLKILL HAVEN, PA.

A letter from the Under Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, on the activities of, expenditures by, and donations to the Anthracite Experiment Station of the Bureau of Mines, Schuylkill Haven, Pa., for the calendar year 1958; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce

REPORT ON PAYMENT OF CLAIMS ARISING FROM CORRECTION OF MILITARY RECORDS OF COAST GUARD PERSONNEL

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report on the payment of claims arising from the correction of military records of Coast Guard personnel, during the 6-month period ended December 31, 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL MEDAL FOR CIVILIAN ACHIEVEMENT

A letter from the Acting Director, Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the conferring of an award to be known as the Presidential Medal for Civilian Achievement, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS—WITHDRAWAL OF NAMES

Six letters from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, withdrawing the names of certain aliens from reports relating to aliens whose deportation has been suspended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Washington; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"RESOLUTION, STATE OF WASHINGTON, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

"Whereas the University of Washington is a recognized leader of the world in all phases of eight-oared crew racing, its oarsmen, coaches, shells, methods, its consistency in winning national, international, and Olympic championships, all attest to its universal preeminance in one of the few remaining sports untainted by any touch of professionalism; and

"Whereas, in furtherance of this highly desirable sport, the University of Washington crew accepted an invitation to compete against the crews of other nations at London and Moscow and was accorded full hospitality by the governments of the host nations; and

"Whereas officials of the civic promotional organization known as Greater Seattle, Inc., have proposed to the U.S. Department of State that the University of Washington reciprocate with a like invitation to crews representing the Soviet Union to compete with the University of Washington and other invited American crews as part of the 1959 Seattle Seafair celebration: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the U.S. Government and particularly the Secretary of State of the United States consider and give the greatest amount of cooperation possible to the submitted plans and assist in bringing about the realization of this highly desirable international contest; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; the Honorable John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State of the United States; the Secretary of the U.S. Senate; the Chief Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives; and the Members of the U.S. Congress representing the State of Washington.

"I hereby certify this to be a true and correct copy of resolution adopted by the house January 14, 1959.

"S. R. HOLCOMB,
"Chief Clerk,
"House of Representatives."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to take such remedial action as deemed necessary to preclude the closing of low-power booster stations necessary for television reception in certain areas of the State of South Dakota

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring therein):

"Whereas there are many communities and farm areas within the State of South Dakota whose people depend upon low-power booster stations as their only means of receiving television programs; and

"Whereas the rugged terrain of the Black Hills region makes the use of ultra-high-frequency translator stations impractical, if, indeed, not impossible, according to the opinions expressed by competent and qualified broadcast engineers, as well as by certain members of the Federal Communications Commission; and

"Whereas it is economically impossible for these communities and farm areas to support, construct, or operate any other form of duly authorized television service; and

"Whereas there is ample proof that low-power booster stations can be regulated so as to preclude interference with licensed television services or other services; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did summarily dismiss without formal hearing its own rulemaking proceedings relating to repeater or booster stations operating in the VHF television band of frequency assignments; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did on December 31, 1958, make formal announcement of its dismissal of petitions for reconsideration, all of which sought to procure reasonable rules which would permit the continued operation of said booster stations under the regulatory power of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the Federal Communications Commission did also announce on December 31, 1958, that all booster stations would be given a period of 90 days in which to apply for conversion to ultra high frequency translators or some other authorized television operation, and upon failure to do so would be ordered to cease operation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 36th Legislature of the State of South Dakota, That this legislature hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States for such remedial action within such 90 day period as the Congress deems fit through the exercise of its authority over the Federal Communications to insure the continued operation of low power booster stations, to the end that the people in the nonmetropolitan areas of the State of South Dakota shall not be denied their basic right to quality of access to the informational, educational, inspirational, cultural, and entertainment service of the American system of free television broadcasting; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of South Dakota in the Congress of the United States.

"_____ _____,
"Lieutenant Governor.
"_____ _____,
"Secretary to Senate.
"_____ _____,
"Speaker.
"_____ _____,
"Chief of Clerk."

The petition of James Lenhoff, of Hammond, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs, Inc., at Rockville Center, Long Island, N.Y., favoring the enforcement of the provisions of H.R. 8002, relating to the operation of the Federal budget on an accrual basis; to the Committee on Government Operations.

A resolution adopted at a convention of the Federation of Jewish Women's Organizations, Inc., of New York, N.Y., favoring the enactment of legislation to amend the McCarran-Walter Immigration and Nationality Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A letter from the Committee of 100 on the Federal City, of Washington, D.C., signed by Neill Phillips, chairman, embodying a resolution adopted by that committee, relating to the establishment of a national cultural center; to the Committee on Public Works.

A telegram in the nature of a petition from Elizabeth Mary Cutler, of Detroit, Mich., relating to financial statements of Gallaudet College in the city of Washington; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

A resolution adopted by the Golden Gate District of the California Federation of Women's Clubs, at San Francisco, Calif., favoring a continuation of the House Committee on Un-American Activities; ordered to lie on the table.

A petition signed by Mary Sevisown, and sundry other citizens of the State of California, praying for a modification of rule XXII of the Senate, relating to cloture; ordered to lie on the table.

By Mr. HENNINGS (for himself and Mr. SYMINGTON):

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION 19

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish a national recreational area on the Current and Eleven Point Rivers as proposed by the National Park Service and the U.S. Forest Service and to declare the Current and Eleven Point Rivers national streams and to provide for the acquisition of the necessary land without exercising the power of eminent domain

"Whereas there exists, in the valleys of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers in Missouri, five springs of the first magnitude and many hundreds of smaller springs which provide a constant supply of clear, cold, sparkling water for these rivers; and

"Whereas the phenomenon of such large volumes of clear, cold water issuing as springs amid rustic and picturesque surroundings, make places of wonder and rare natural beauty, which offer a lure and inspiration to those who come to view these extraordinary manifestations of nature, and to play, rest, and to refresh themselves in a peaceful and inspiring environment; and

"Whereas these springs make a valuable contribution to fish life in these streams by providing favorable sites for fish hatcheries, and by discharging large quantities of crystal-clear water, they become the controlling factor favorable to the propagation and maintenance of game fish and other aquatic life natural to both streams; and

"Whereas the State of Missouri and the U.S. Forest Service own vast acreage adjacent to these streams suitable for recreational development and other improvements for the public use; and

"Whereas the Current and Eleven Point Rivers are nationally famous for their 'John Boat' float fishing trips through this Ozark scenic wonderland; and

"Whereas the Arkansas-White-Red Basins Interagency Committee, recognizing the unique natural qualities of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers of Missouri, and their importance to present and future generations, recommended that appropriate State and Federal agencies prepare a plan to preserve and enhance the natural qualities of this region; and

"Whereas a plan was prepared by the National Park Service in cooperation with Missouri State agencies, and was published by the division of resources and development, to preserve and develop the Current and Eleven Point River country, without the exercise of the power of eminent domain; and

"Whereas the U.S. Forest Service has indicated a similar interest in the preservation and development of lands adjacent to these streams by recommending the creation of a National Forest recreation area in a national recreation plan prepared and adopted in 1936: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Missouri House of Representatives, in its 70th general assembly, request of the Congress of the United States, that it establish a national recreation area along the Current and Eleven Point Rivers of Missouri and that it declare the Current and Eleven Point Rivers as national streams; and be it further

"Resolved, That this assembly request that the Congress enact the necessary legislation providing for the purchase and development of the national recreation area as heretofore described, lest the great scenic and recreational values of the Current and Eleven Point Rivers in Missouri be lost forever to public use by manmade encroachments; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the house be instructed to send copies of this memorial to the President of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to the Missouri Members of the House and Senate."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF ORGANIZATIONS OF STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a series of resolutions adopted by organizations of the State of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Finance:

"QUEENS JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE FEDERAL EXCISE TAX ON TELEPHONE SERVICE, PASSED JANUARY 15, 1959

"Whereas the Federal excise tax on telephone service was initially levied as an emergency measure temporarily enacted to provide revenue for the war and to discourage the use of this essential service; and

"Whereas Congress has acted to remove similar discriminatory tax burdens on other public utility services such as the elimination of the excise tax on the use of electrical energy; and

"Whereas the Joint Federal-State Action Committee has recommended that Congress distribute 40 percent of the present Federal excise tax on local telephone service to the States to carry on vocational education and to construct facilities for the abatement of water pollution; and

"Whereas telephone service is completely unrelated to such vocational education and water pollution control; and

"Whereas this proposal places a disproportionate share of the tax burden upon the telephone users of our State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Queens Junior Chamber of Commerce is opposed to the transfer of any portion of the present temporary Federal excise tax to the States as a means of financing specific programs which have no relationship to telephone service; further

"Resolved, That we are opposed to any action that would be taken to make the present Federal excise tax, in any way, a permanent part of the tax structure of either the Federal or State government; further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions shall be forwarded to each Member of the House of Representatives serving the county of Queens as well as the U.S. Senators representing the State of New York.

"RESOLUTION URGING REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES ON COMMUNICATION SERVICES AND TRANSPORTATION OF PERSONS, PASSED ON JANUARY 21, 1959, GREATER NEWBURGH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, NEWBURGH, N.Y.

"Whereas the Federal excise taxes on public utility and transportation services were initially levied or greatly increased during World War II to help defray war costs and to discourage unnecessary use of such services, and

"Whereas Congress has acted to remove a substantial portion of this discriminatory tax burden on public utility and transportation services by elimination of excise taxes on the use of electrical energy and the shipment of goods and property, and

"Whereas today, 13 years after cessation of hostilities, the excise taxes on communication services and the for-hire transportation of persons are still in effect and are continuing to discourage the public use of these services which are now the only services, regulated or unregulated, against which any Federal excise taxes are levied, and

"Whereas a committee of the 85th Congress rejected a proposal for the enactment of legislation which would have continued the Federal excise tax on local telephone service at a lesser rate and which also would have required the imposition of the balance of this unpopular tax by the individual States as a means of financing a proposed transfer to the States of certain activities completely unrelated to communication services, and

"Whereas the Joint Federal-State Action Committee has recommended that Congress authorize distribution for a period of 5 years, 40 percent of the present Federal excise tax on local telephone service to the States in such amounts as to provide revenues equivalent to 140 percent of Federal grants now being made to the respective States to carry on vocational education, and to construct facilities for abatement of water pollution, which are completely unrelated to communications service, and

"Whereas the proposal of the Joint Federal-State Action Committee would tend to cause the States to pass laws imposing excise taxes on local telephone service and would tend to make such taxes a permanent part of the tax structure of both the Federal and State Government: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Greater Newburgh Chamber of Commerce is of the opinion that the discriminatory excise taxes on communication and transportation services are not in the public interest, that such taxes should not continue to be levied by the Federal Government; and

"Resolved further, That any similar tax on communications should not be levied by the individual States against the users of this essential service as a means of financing specific programs which bear no relation to the service taxed, and

"Resolved further, That Congress is hereby petitioned to terminate the discrimination excise taxes on communication and transportation services at the earliest possible date.

"RODERICK D. MACDOUGALL,
"Chairman, Legislative Committee, Greater Newburgh Chamber of Commerce."

"RESOLUTION OF CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CAMDEN, N.Y.

"The Chamber of Commerce of Camden, N.Y., has requested that the following resolution be forwarded to you as an expression of their feeling concerning the excise tax on telephone service:

" 'Whereas the present excise tax on telephone service was originally enacted as an emergency wartime measure; and

" 'Whereas telephone service can no longer be considered a luxury item, and any tax thereon is discriminatory; and

" 'Whereas proposed legislation would earmark part of the proceeds of this tax for State construction of facilities for abatement of water pollution and for State programs for vocational education, and although the purposes are desirable, there appears to be no logical connection between the tax and such allocation of the proceeds: Now, therefore, be it

" 'Resolved, That Camden Chamber of Commerce, Inc., urges the excise tax on telephone service be wholly eliminated.'

"Respectfully yours,
"CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, INC.,
"BRUCE BRUMMITT,
"Recording Secretary."

To the Committee on Government Operations:

"RESOLUTION OF CONVENTION OF THE LONG ISLAND FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS, INC., REQUESTING ENFORCEMENT OF H.R. 8002

"Whereas there is concern over higher taxes and increasing inflation due to continued Federal deficit spending and money policies; and

"Whereas the Hoover Committee recommendation, H.R. 8002, placing our Federal Government budget procedure on an annual accrual basis, has been passed by both the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives; Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs, Inc., in convention assembled this 16th day of January 1959, urge our elected officials to enforce the law of the land by insisting that the Federal budget be operated on an annual accrual basis; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower; the Vice President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon; Director of the Budget, Maurice F. Stans; majority and minority leaders of the U.S. Senate and House; chairmen of the Senate and the House Committees on Government Operations; chairmen of Appropriations of the Senate and House; U.S. Senators from New York, Senator Javits and Senator Keating; Members of the House of Representatives from the Long Island area.

"Submitted by the legislative and civics committee of the Long Island Federation of Women's Clubs, Inc., Mrs. Harold A. Bauman, chairman."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, without amendment:

AMENDMENT OF TITLE II OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Social Security Act, to increase, from $1,200 to $1,800 a year, the amount of outside earnings permitted without deductions from benefits.

My purpose in introducing the bill is simply to permit working people to earn a larger amount of money and still draw social security payments.

Under the present Social Security Act, persons who are retired on social security pensions are permitted to earn up to $1,200 a year, either as an employee or from self-employment.

If they earn more than $1,200 a year, they are penalized—they suffer deductions from their benefits. And what for? For trying to earn enough to meet the simplest needs of living.

In this country today we have more people over 65 than at any time in our history; and many thousands of them cannot afford to retire on their benefits alone. They are obliged to continue at least part-time work. This bill will allow them to earn a little more and not be penalized for doing it.

There is a crying need for a change in this provision of the law. For many thousands of our senior citizens this bill means the difference between a bare existence and a decent living.

Considering the small amounts some of them actually receive under social security, and also considering what it takes today to meet even the most ordinary living requirements, I think we will all agree that this restriction can be eased somewhat.

I also wish to make one other point, brief though it may be: I can see no reason why retired persons should not have a greater opportunity to help consume our Nation's products. Added purchasing power in the hands of those who depend on social security checks every month would be put into consumer goods and products. It would be a stimulant for business and prosperity, as well as a measure of justice for the deserving senior citzens of our country.

Today it is very difficult for many to live on a retirement income, and I sincerely believe we should be more realistic in helping these people live out their later years in comfort.

In view of the number of bills amending various provisions of the Social Security Act being introduced in both the House and Senate, I must assume that many feel there are inequities in the act as it now stands. The inequity which this bill would correct is one of the most obvious.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 679) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase from $1,200 to $1,800 the annual amount individuals are permitted to earn without suffering deductions from the insurance benefits payable to them under such title, introduced by Mr. BRIDGES, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

INCREASED USE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes and for the development of new crops.

Last year, several Senators, including myself, introduced proposed legislation on this subject. The Senate Agriculture Committee took the various bills introduced and combined the better qualities of each into a committee bill. This committee bill passed the Senate practically without dissent. The House failed to act; but it is my understanding that the Agriculture Committee in the House was going to take up the bill, for consideration, when Congress adjourned.

All real friends of the farmer are going to concentrate on ways of helping him, rather than on dissipating their energies on details of how we help him. Aid for agriculture is the thing; if we enjoy the luxury of differing as to method, we must not hinder progress toward assisting our national agricultural industry. I am sure that all of us are in agreement on this basic idea: Our Nation's farmers are the backbone of the national economy; and in helping him, we help ourselves. I may feel that my ways of rendering assistance are better than the next fellow's; but this is not going to deter me one whit from giving my wholehearted support to a compromise program that carries with it the hope of bettering agriculture.

Research is the key that unlocks many doors. When we view the surpluses of agricultural products, we realize the urgent need of wider and more intensive research for new uses for those products and for new products that will yield paying crops.

Research is a multiplier that increases multiple uses of basic products. I never cease to wonder at the work of George Washington Carver, whose genius was able to develop more than 100 byproducts from the humble peanut. Who knows what untapped secrets nature has stored up in other everyday products.

Yes, research is a creative force, generating progress, sparking productivity, promoting comfort, adding to total living. Research creates wealth through inventiveness, and ministers to man's welfare.

Behind any successful manufacturing company we find a substantial research program. The more successful the company, the more funds are being poured back into the business, through the medium of research. Fiscal analysts tell us one of the best ways to determine the future prospects of any given company is to read its financial statement and learn what part of its earnings is being plowed back in the form of research. Companies that fail to provide adequate research programs soon wind up "in the ditch." The leading corporations are strong on research.

Mr. President, we must do for research in agriculture what industry does for its research. We cannot, in national self-interest, afford to do less. Every dollar invested in agricultural research will come back manyfold, and the beneficial effects will pour into all segments of the economy.

Judging by commercial standards, the ratio of expenditures for research to the total dollar value of the Nation's agricultural products is relatively small. More, much more needs to be done.

The bill I now introduce contains certain authority that is not now available to the Department of Agriculture, but which I believe is necessary if agricultural research is to produce the expected results. This includes authority for research grants, student fellowships, scholarships, and similar aids to strengthen graduate training.

There is widespread recognition that a prosperous agricultural industry is one of the basic necessities of a strong America. Farmers are one of the most important consumer groups in America. For our Nation to be prosperous, the farmer has to be in a position to buy the products of industry. It is true that the number of farmers in America has decreased in recent years, but statistics show that purchases by farmers for production and consumption have increased.

The Commission on Increased Industrial Use of Agricultural Products stresses the economic importance of the farmer in the following words:

> Two-fifths of the Nation's total economic activity arises from agriculture and related business functions.

Mr. President, the broad objectives of the measure we are now considering were outlined in the report of the aforementioned Commission. After a thorough study and survey of the agricultural industry, the Commission last year made major recommendations looking toward comprehensive research to bring about the greatest possible industrial uses of agricultural products.

In its report, the Commission said:

> In the past 25 years agriculture often has been researched right out of its natural domain. Industry will continue to explore the unknown in search for new products and new uses for old products. Nothing is plainer in the economic pattern of today than that agriculture must compete in areas of basic and applied scientific research. Agriculture should be enabled to compete as an equal, in the contest for consumer acceptance. It is now losing by default.

The Commission was created in accordance with section 209 of Public Law 540, 84th Congress. It filed an interim report on April 17, 1956, and its final report on June 15, 1957.

Altogether, the Commission made eight pertinent recommendations, and also obtained suggestions through correspondence with experiment station directors and more than 350 industrial executives. The work of the Commission was well planned and comprehensive.

In its report, the Commission stated it found it—> necessary to obtain quickly:

> (1) An adequate assessment of the current state of industrial utilization research.
> (2) A sound appraisal of its possibilities.
> (3) Adequate understanding of the obstacles to further development.

To this end, the Commission set up task groups or special committees in the following areas:

> Corn wet-milling, cotton, crop residues, industrial alcohol from grain, industrial uses for grain other than alcohol, dairy products, forage crops, forest products, fruits and vegetables, hides, skins, and animal byproducts, new and special crops, oilseeds and animal fats, poultry products, rice, sugar, tobacco, white potato products, wool and mohair.

Not the least important of the Commission's conclusions of its studies was the last, which reads:

> The dynamic forces which created American industrial development must be motivated in the farm economy.

Mr. President, it is noteworthy that the Commission's first recommendation called for a substantial increase in research funds, and did so in the following language:

> The Commission proposes as its first and most necessary recommendations that the funds for industrial uses research be increased to not less than three times the amounts ($16,145,000) currently available; and that additional sums be provided, as herein suggested, for new crop research, trial commercialization, development, and incentives.

Immediately following this, the Commission recommended that the facilities of the Department of Agriculture be fully utilized in furthering the research program, as well as land-grant colleges, experiment stations, universities, and colleges, private research organizations, and foreign institutions. There followed a recommendation for research grants and fellowships, scholarships, and similar aids that, while furthering research projects, would also increase the supply of trained scientists.

Special emphasis was put by the Commission on the new crop projects with the purpose of creating durable, additional markets, and for rapid disposal, through industrial channels, of accumulated surpluses.

The Commission found that the current industrial outlets for the products of the total farm acreage, estimated to be less than 7 percent, are undeniably small.

One of the most encouraging leads to be developed by the Commission was the prospect of a major crop for the South—bamboo. This product has shown great potential in the paper field, as well as in furniture and plastics. I am pleased to report that preliminary experimentation and work with this crop have already been started in South Carolina and Georgia by private firms, and through the Clemson College Edisto Experiment Station, near Blackville, S.C.

A whole regional economy can be uplifted and transformed through the development of some such good, new pay crop. We all know what has been accomplished with the soybean—the commercial markets it commands, the jobs it has created, the payrolls it accounts for. Who knows how many such undiscovered commercial products await in the darkness that can be pierced only by the searchlight of research. Is it any wonder that we approach this research program with enthusiasm and great expectations—holding, as it does, vast vistas of opportunities?

In my opinion, no proposed legislation that has come before the Senate in recent years is more important from the farmers' standpoint.

We must enact this bill in order to step up our research. The Congress has appropriated billions of dollars for foreign aid; much of it has gone for research in foreign countries. It is inconceivable to me that this opportunity to help our own people and our own economy would not be availed of.

I hope this agriculture research bill will pass Congress this session. There is a tremendous need for agriculture research. Such research can help our farmers and industries find new sources of income and production.

The bill I introduce is the same as the one the Senate Agriculture Committee reported, and is identical with the one passed last year by the Senate. I hope we shall be able to expedite this measure, so it will be in the hands of the House of Representatives for early action.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill lie on the desk for 1 week, in order that Senators who may wish to cosponsor it with me may have an opportunity to do so. I have received several requests regarding cosponsorship.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

The bill (S. 690) to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

EXTENSION OF COVERAGE UNDER OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE PROVISIONS OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills to extend coverage under the old age and survivors insurance provisions of the Social Security Act to dependent and orphaned children in two additional categories. The first bill, which is being sponsored in the House by Representative RUSSELL MACK of Washington would raise from 18 to 21 years the maximum age for receiving benefits under title II of the act in the case of children who continue to attend school. The second measure provides that in a case where an individual has assumed full parental responsibility for a minor 5 years or longer even though no legal relationship exists, child's insurance benefits may be received.

Both these amendments are certainly in step with present administration policy to broaden social security coverage to include a larger proportion of our population, and to correct inequities. Right now, the abrupt discontinuance of survivors insurance benefits for dependents when they reach 18 often imposes an unfair financial burden on widowed mothers determined to secure a college education for their children. In many more cases, any hope of a higher education is out of the question and the child's schooling ends.

If my proposal is enacted, however, it is estimated that approximately 115,000 young people between the ages of 18 and 21 would be eligible to receive an average of $42.30 in social security benefits—up to a maximum of $87 each month so long as they remained in school. At a time when some 200,000 young people who merit it reportedly do not continue their studies primarily for lack of funds, this bill would make available an additional $507 annually on an average and materially assist dependent children in obtaining the type of advance training in science, technology education, and the arts so essential to our society in the space age before us.

The cost of such extended coverage is estimated to be $75 million for the children and $30 million for the mothers, and is minimal when viewed as a percentage of payroll taxable under the old-age, survivors and disability insurance programs. It would constitute 0.08 percent of the total.

The second bill I am introducing plugs a gap in title II coverage which can result in undue hardship and deprivation for young children as well as teen-agers. The Social Security Act does not presently apply in a case where a child has become completely dependent upon a person who, although no legal or blood relation, has in fact taken the place of a parent. I think it is only fair that individuals involved in such situations should be eligible for child's insurance benefits in full under the old-age and survivors insurance provisions of the act. Of course, this extension would increase the number of children who could receive substantial educational benefit if the maximum age for receiving benefits is raised to 21.

The latter bill was drafted as a result of a request from a Watertown constituent, Charles M. Rueckwald, a chiropractor. He originally wrote Senator Ives who directed him to us, outlining his own family situation. For several years, he wrote, he has been supporting the children of a relative by marriage and for all practical purposes has become their parent. The children are Canadian by birth, but will become American citizens, and the constituent wants to be reassured that should anything happen to him, these children will be eligible for social security benefits just as if they were his very own. Feeling that similar situations undoubtedly exist in many families throughout the Nation, he requested a bill which would extend social security coverage in such cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. KEATING), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

S. 704. A bill to increase, in the case of children who are attending school, from 18 to 21 years the age until which child's insurance benefits may be received under title II of the Social Security Act; and

S. 705. A bill amending title II of the Social Security Act to permit certain children to receive benefits thereunder on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of an individual who has stood in loco parentis with respect to them for at least 5 years preceding his death.

ERECTION OF A FEDERAL BUILDING, OGDEN, UTAH

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, during the 85th Congress, I introduced appropriate legislation to authorize the construction of a new $6,500,000 Federal building in Ogden, Utah. This special bill was introduced because of the urgent need for improved facilities to house the post office, the courts, and the many other agencies of Government presently crammed into the old and inadequate Federal Building in Ogden, which is the second largest city in the State of Utah.

Since the introduction of S. 3806 on May 15, 1958, I have been informed by the General Services Administration, that a draft bill for a comprehensive overall program for construction of Federal buildings has been submitted to the chairman of the House and Senate Public Works Committees for appropriate action. In this regard, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter dated August 13, 1958, which I received from Franklin Floete, Administrator of the General Services Administration, relating to this matter. The letter follows:

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

Washington, D.C., August 13, 1958.

Hon. WALLACE F. BENNETT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BENNETT: Your letter of August 6 expressed your interest in obtaining authorization for the construction of a new Federal building in Ogden, Utah.

As you pointed out, our surveys indicate the need for a building in Ogden, and we have prepared estimates on the basis of a new courthouse and Federal office building. The need existing in Ogden puts the community well up on the priority list for early construction. In the event our appropriation request for fiscal year 1960 should contain an item for construction of buildings not yet authorized, we will give careful consideration to including the Ogden project.

Meanwhile, we have transmitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives for referral to the appropriate committees a draft bill which would further amend the Public Buildings Act of 1926 (44 Stat. 630), as amended, to provide general programing authority and establish criteria for approval of projects. We believe that this will provide a sound basis for the development of future programs composed of individual projects, each of which will be required to have the prior approval of the Committees on Public Works of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN FLOETE,
Administrator.

Mr. President, the proposed legislation mentioned in Mr. Floete's letter was submitted to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House on August 4, 1958, and was referred to the Public Works Committees of the two bodies for appropriate action. Congress adjourned before this matter could be reviewed and appropriate bills introduced for consideration by the House and Senate.

During this last week, I made it a point to check with the clerk of the Public Works Committee, and discovered that no action has been taken to study or analyze the bill preparatory to its being introduced or considered. I also checked with the General Services Administration, and was informed that several changes are to be made to the proposed draft bill submitted last year. GSA has completed their reappraisal and submitted a recommended new bill to the Bureau of the Budget for review. It is hoped that the new bill will be ready for submission to the Senate and House Public Works Committees in the near future.

Inasmuch as there is no certainty as to when the general bill, which will amend the Public Buildings Act, will be introduced or approved by Congress, I believe it advisable to again introduce a special bill to authorize construction of a new Federal building at Ogden, Utah. Field surveys were completed at my request in the spring of 1957 and a determination made by General Services Administration that a new building was urgently needed at Ogden. There is no reason why this project should be held up to await the outcome of an omnibus bill which might linger for months in the Bureau of the Budget, or in committee after it is finally submitted to the Congress. Therefore, I am today introducing this bill, and I understand Congressman DIXON will introduce a companion bill on the House side to authorize the Ogden project.

The GSA survey of the Ogden Federal building project indicates that there is an immediate need for 160,000 square feet of office space. In addition to space needed for the post office, the new Federal building would house the Federal court, Internal Revenue Service, Social Security Administration, Bureau of Reclamation, Farmers Home Administration, Soil Conservation Service, the Selective Service Office, recruiting offices for the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and several other agencies of the Federal Government which are now scattered in leased space throughout the Ogden area.

It is my hope that Congress will take early action on this special bill, or rush consideration of the proposed amendments to the Public Buildings Act, so that this critical need for a new Federal building at Ogden might be alleviated at an early date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 172) to provide for the erection of a Federal building in Ogden, Utah, introduced by Mr. BENNETT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

REVISION OF BOUNDARIES OF ZION NATIONAL PARK, UTAH

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill on behalf of myself and my colleague the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] which would revise the boundaries of the Zion National Park to permit full development of this majestic area under the Mission 66 program administered by the National Park Service. Representative DIXON will introduce a companion bill in the House.

The adjustments are needed because of the relocation of limited access Highway U.S. 91 which is to be constructed across the western corner of Zion National Park. The proposed change would provide a more natural boundary for, and access to, the Kolob Creek section which has been neglected for so many years. It would also permit the proposed future development of a road from Hop Valley to the park.

The bill is also designed to facilitate development of the West Zion road and related improvements; to implement the water supply for the ranger station and fire lookout station at Lava Point; and to provide additional protection for the south face of West Temple, which is a feature already in the park. The bill will also make possible future campground expansion.

In 1957, I asked the Department of the Interior to hold a hearing in Cedar City to explain the purposes of the bill which I am introducing today. The hearing was held on June 12, 1957, and there was complete local agreement in support of the National Park Service recommendations now embodied in the bill. On December 9, 1958, I sent a copy of the proposed bill to the Five County Organization (Beaver, Iron, Washington, Kane and Garfield) in southeastern Utah. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of their January 9 resolution endorsing the bill be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks:

Be it resolved by the Five County Organization at the meeting held in St. George, Utah, January 9, 1959, to endorse the proposed draft of a bill adjusting the boundary of Zion National Park in order that the National Park Service may proceed with its Mission 66 program for the improvements scheduled.

It is also recommended that Senator BENNETT be notified of our action, replying to his inquiry of December 9, and that the other members of the Utah delegation be requested to support the bill in the Congress.

Mr. President, on July 11, 1956, my bill to consolidate Zion National Monument with Zion National Park was signed by President Eisenhower. Certainly this magnificent area is worthy of such status and it is my profound hope that these two bills will lay the groundwork to develop the old monument area which has been neglected for decades.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 713) to revise the boundaries of the Zion National Park in the State of Utah, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BENNETT (for himself and Mr. Moss), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Utah a statement prepared by the able junior Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasure to join with my colleague, Senator BENNETT, in cosponsoring the bill to adjust the boundaries of Zion National Park in Utah.

I have spent considerable time in this spectacular area, and I am wholeheartedly in accord with any proposal which will permit the more comprehensive development and better management of its unique scenic attractions.

It is important to emphasize, I believe, that the action contemplated under the bill has the unanimous endorsement of the residents of the area. No grazing lands, or other lands of importance to the ranchers or farmers of the area, will be affected by the proposed changes.

Enactment of the bill introduced today will permit the people of Utah, as well as the thousands of people from all over the world who annually visit the southern Utah wonderland, to more fully enjoy the magnificent area of western scenery that is encompassed in Zion National Park.

AMENDMENT OF CLAYTON ACT RELATIVE TO ENFORCEMENT OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section 11 of the Clayton Antitrust Act. It would strengthen that act in two important respects. First, it provides that cease and desist orders issued under the act shall become final 60 days after issuance if judicial review is not sought. Second, it would make violations of such orders subject to civil penalties.

The Federal Trade Commission, one of several agencies authorized to issue cease and desist orders under the Clayton Act, has sought this legislation for more than 20 years. This is one of the President's recommendations in his economic report.

The reason for the amendment is that before a respondent can now actually be punished for violation of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, the Commission must conduct three successive investigations and must on three successive occasions prove violations of the law.

Quite obviously that procedure is laborious, time consuming, very expensive, and entirely unnecessary. Yet the same situation used to prevail under the Federal Trade Commission Act prior to its amendment in 1938.

This legislation would do no more than make enforcement procedures under the Clayton Act the same as they are and since 1938 have been under the Federal Trade Commission Act.

This bill is the same as S. 721 in the last Congress which, after hearings, was favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee to the Senate in Senate Report 1808. This bill has been sponsored and put forward by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. It was recommended by the Senate Small Business Committee of which Senator SPARKMAN is chairman. In the hearings all affected agencies supported the measure. The bill was passed by the Senate and sent to the House where it was referred to the Judiciary Committee which failed to take any action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 714) to amend section 11 of the Clayton Act to provide for the more expeditious enforcement of cease and desist orders issued thereunder, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF LAW RELATING TO INDECENT PUBLICATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. LANGER, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the law relating to indecent publications in the District of Columbia.

This measure would allow the police or the U.S. marshal in the District to confiscate any vehicle, fixture, equipment, stock, or personalty used in the sale, distribution, manufacture, showing, advertising, or staging an exhibition of publications of an obscene or lewd nature. This, in effect, would increase the penalty against the peddlers of pornography in the District of Columbia.

Testimony before the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency a few years ago revealed that much of the pornography being distributed in this country was getting into the hands of juveniles. In the report which we issued on this subject, we recommended that local ordinances and State statutes be reexamined and reevaluated to assure that modern and effective means are available to law enforcement officials to deter the production, distribution, and sale of pornographic material.

A representative of the Metropolitan Police Department testified at our hearings that he felt that the penalties imposed on the purveyors of indecent material were so light as to constitute little more than a "license fee." He gave the following dispositions of cases as examples: "$250 or 90 days; $100 or 60 days; nol prossed; nol prossed; $100 or 60 days; $100 or 60 days; not guilty; nol prossed; $100 or 90 days; $100 or 90 days." This is small punishment indeed for the unscrupulous characters who corrupt the morals of our young people for profit. In many instances, such fines can be paid out of the profits that can be garnered in a short time with little effort.

This measure, if enacted into law, would, I believe, be a strong deterrent to the hucksters of indecency in the District of Columbia. In discharging our responsibility to the citizens of the District, it is our duty to provide the local law enforcement officials with the necessary tools to keep the community a clean and decent place to live and to rear children.

Mr. President, I commend this bill to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 715) to amend the law relating to indecent publications in the District of Columbia, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself, Mr. CARROLL, and and Mr. LANGER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE IN CERTAIN CASES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill for the purpose of authorizing the Attorney General to compel the production of documentary evidence required in civil investigations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. This is one of the measures urged by the President in his Economic Report of January 20.

Judge Hansen, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, testified in hearings before the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee last year that the authority such as provided in this bill would greatly aid the enforcement of the antitrust laws in civil cases.

Under the bill, when the Attorney General has reason to believe that any person has documentary material bearing on any antitrust investigation he may issue in writing a civil investigative demand for the production of such evidence.

The bill provides for the enforcement of the demand in the courts. It also protects the public against an unreasonable demand by requiring the demand to meet the standards which apply in the courts to a grand jury subpena duces tecum. It also safeguards the confidentiality of the documents furnished, the preservation and the return of the documents. In my opinion, the civil enforcement would be greatly strengthened by the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this bill lay on the desk for 1 week in order that other Senators may have an opportunity to consider joining me in sponsoring it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the table, as requested by the Senator from Tennessee.

The bill (S. 716) to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of documentary evidence required in civil investigations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AFTERCARE POSTHOSPITAL TREATMENT PROGRAM FOR DRUG ADDICTION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference on behalf of myself and Senators HENNINGS, CARROLL, and LANGER a bill concerning the aftercare treatment of narcotic addicts. The overall purpose of the bill is to strengthen and improve the Federal program for the treatment and rehabilitation of narcotic addicts who have been confined to the two Federal hospitals that handle narcotic drug addiction cases.

The bill contains amendments to sections 341 and 344 of the Public Health Service Act. It authorizes for the establishment by the Federal Government of aftercare treatment units for addict patients who have been released from the Federal hospitals at Lexington and at Fort Worth.

It has been estimated that two-thirds of the drug patients admitted to the hospital at Lexington, Ky., the largest U.S. Public Health Service hospital treating drug addicts, come as volunteers. The remainder are Federal prisoners. Of this two-thirds, 73 percent leave before they have stayed the minimum prescribed 4½-month period which the hospital physicians feel is necessary for treatment. More important, neither of the two hospitals has a formal aftercare treatment program. It is known both by physicians in the hospital and by local law-enforcement officials in our large urban areas that the majority of these patients immediately resume their drug use upon release from the institutions. As in all fields of correctional treatment, there is an imperative need for a complete treatment program, that is, a program that includes some sort of supervision and help back in the community. It is there, after all, that the trouble began in the first place—and it is there that important changes must be wrought if we are to have even a modicum of success in treating the drug addict.

As chairman of the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency for several years, I was impressed by the fact that unlike other types of juvenile offenders, where it is at least several weeks or months before they repeat their delinquent behavior, if at all, in the case of young drug addicts it is many times a matter of minutes or hours upon release from an institution before they are once again taking narcotic drugs.

It is known that because of his personality makeup, the addict, after only a few months of treatment in an institution, is not capable of handling some of the vicissitudes of life that most human beings encounter. At the slightest frustration he is easily induced to go back to a life of drug use. Actually, then, upon an addict's release really intensive treatment should begin back in the community where a comprehensive aftercare program would include counseling and guidance in his times of stress; reestablishing of good relationships with his family and friends; and the help he needs to finish his schooling or to acquire a job, without the barriers that are usually put up before persons who have committed antisocial behavior and subsequently have been incarcerated.

I submit that without the aftercare treatment program that would be authorized by this bill the wonderful efforts of our two outstanding Federal narcotic hospitals will continue to be dissipated by the shortsighted approach that is presently taken. Until such a program is inaugurated, we shall continue to leave the job of saving our youth from the ravages of narcotic addiction half done.

Mr. President, I commend this bill to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 717) to authorize the establishing by the Surgeon General of an aftercare posthospital treatment program for drug addiction, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. LANGER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN UNLAWFUL PRACTICES IN CONNECTION WITH PLACING OF MINOR CHILDREN FOR PERMANENT CARE OR ADOPTION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators CARROLL and LANGER, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to make unlawful certain practices in connection with the placing of minor children for permanent free care or for adoption.

To begin with, I should like to make it abundantly clear that this legislation, if enacted into law, would in no way affect the operations of authorized and licensed agencies, nor would it interfere with the rights of attorneys for services rendered directly in connection with the obtaining of an adoption decree nor with the rights of doctors to obtain reasonable fees for necessary medical services rendered in connection with prenatal care of the natural mother and delivery of the child or with a physical examination of the child involved.

This bill is not aimed at these legitimate operations but at what is commonly referred to as the black market in babies. At the present time there is no Federal law to prohibit the selling of babies or children across State lines, although we have taken care to see that an illicitly obtained car, motorboat, or other property cannot be so sold without fear of incurring Federal penalties. Surely our children are worthy of the same consideration.

There are many couples in this country who are eager to adopt children, and they are easy prey for the baby racketeer who has no qualms about profiting from this situation and that of the unhappy mother, who is generally a young unmarried girl.

It is true that it sometimes takes longer than couples wish to wait to get a child through a legitimate agency. However, when adoptions are made in this manner, there are safeguards for the child, the natural parents, and the adoptive parents, matters which are of little concern to the unscrupulous individuals whose primary interest is the money involved, although they may make a plea that they are motivated by humanitarian considerations.

The amounts of money involved in these black-market transactions are considerable; several years ago when the Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency went into this matter it was estimated that $15 million changed hands each year in the interstate baby-selling business.

I submit, Mr. President, that this measure is necessary to protect the more than 160,000 children who are born out of wedlock each year, their unfortunate mothers, and the prospective adoptive parents.

Mr. President, I commend this bill to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 720) to amend title 18, United States Code, to make unlawful certain practices in connection with the placing of minor children for permanent free care or for adoption, introduced by Mr. KEFAUVER (for himself, Mr. CARROLL, and Mr. LANGER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF CLAYTON ACT, AS AMENDED, RELATING TO EQUALITY OF OPPORTUNITY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON] may be added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 11) to amend the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act with reference to equality of opportunity, introduced by me, on behalf of myself and other Senators, on January 9, 1959.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FINANCING OF POLITICAL CAMPAIGNS — ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 17, 1959, the names of Senators CASE of New Jersey, GREEN, CANNON, MORSE, and JAVITS were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 466) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HENNINGS (for himself, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. ENGLE) on January 17, 1959.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have my name included as a cosponsor of Senate bill 466, the Federal Elections Act of 1959. The bill was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] on Saturday, January 17, 1959. Although the measure has gone to the printer, I should like to have my name on record as one of the cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FOOD ALLOTMENT PROGRAM—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, about a week ago, on behalf of myself and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], I introduced a food allotment bill, S. 585. I ask unanimous consent to have added to the list of sponsors of the proposed legislation the names of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FREE MARKETING OF GOLD—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 20, 1959, the names of Senators MANSFIELD and KUCHEL were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 590) to permit the free marketing of gold, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. GRUENING) on January 20, 1959.

DEPARTMENT OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 23, 1959, the names of Senators GRUENING, YARBOROUGH, and MUSKIE were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 676) to create a Department of Science and Technology, and to transfer certain agencies and functions to such Department, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. MCCLELLAN, and Mr. ERVIN) on January 23, 1959.

TELEVISION BOOSTER STATIONS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF JOINT RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 23, 1959, the names of Mr. HRUSKA and Mr. GOLDWATER were added as additional cosponsors of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 26) to direct the Federal Communications Commission to authorize for a certain period the operation of very high frequency television booster stations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. ALLOTT (for himself and other Senators) on January 23, 1959.

EXTENSION AND AMENDMENT OF LAWS RELATING TO THE PROVISION AND IMPROVEMENT OF HOUSING—AMENDMENT

Mr. BUSH submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 57) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the renewal of urban communities, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY—AMENDMENT

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], and myself, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by us jointly, to the bill (S. 75) to establish the Rural Electrification Administration as an independent agency, and for other purposes.

At the time of introduction of this bill, I spoke of the outstanding accomplishments of David Hamil as REA Administrator. I assumed, and I believe correctly, that enactment of this bill would result in the expeditious renomination and confirmation of Mr. Hamil as Administrator of the independent agency.

Apparently, some persons devoted to the objectives of REA are concerned that Mr. Hamil might not be reappointed should the Curtis-Russell bill be enacted. I am, therefore, offering an amendment to this bill which will assure Mr. Hamil the continuance of his term of Administrator upon enactment of S. 75. Like everyone who has witnessed the excellent progress of REA under Mr. Hamil, I want to pay tribute to his leadership, and assure him we want his continuing good work.

Nebraska can point with great pride to many successes in the advancement of REA which were so ably supported by Dave Hamil. I am proud to endorse his record for his many friends throughout Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and will be printed.

EXTENSION AND AMENDMENT OF LAWS RELATING TO PROVISION AND IMPROVEMENT OF HOUSING—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BUSH submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 612) to extend and amend laws relating to the provision and improvement of housing and the conservation and development of urban communities, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY ENTITLED "FULL USE AND DEVELOPMENT OF MONTANA'S TIMBER RESOURCES" (S. DOC. NO. 9)

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print as a Senate document, with illustrations, a survey compiled by the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, entitled "Full Use and Development of Montana's Timber Resources."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON:

Address entitled "Victory for America," delivered by Senator JOHNSON of Texas at the Democratic victory dinner in Albuquerque, N. Mex., on January 24, 1959.

PROPOSED LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM LEGISLATION — ANNOUNCEMENT OF HEARINGS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I should like to announce that the Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will commence hearings on proposed labor-management reform legislation tomorrow morning at 10:30 o'clock in the committee hearing room on the fourth floor of the New Senate Office Building. The hearings will continue through next week, and the subcommittee will be delighted to hear the testimony or statements of any Member of the Senate who desires to comment on the proceedings.

The first witness will speak for the AFL–CIO, and will be followed, on Thursday, by Prof. Archibald Cox and Prof. Godfrey Schmidt. On Friday the subcommittee has invited the Secretary of Labor to testify.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] be added to the list of cosponsors of Senate bill 505.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY VICE PRESIDENT NIXON BEFORE ALUMNI ASSOCIATION OF FORDHAM COLLEGE

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the address to be delivered by Vice President NIXON this evening at the Fordham College Alumni Association dinner in New York.

The address furnishes further example of the rare understanding, ability, and leadership of the Vice President.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FORDHAM COLLEGE ALUMNI ASSOCIATION DINNER, NEW YORK, N.Y., JANUARY 27, 1959

Mr. Mikoyan left these shores just a little over a week ago. Americans have disagreed and still disagree as to the ultimate results of this unusual tour. Some have stated strongly that his coming was definitely harmful to the best interests of the United States. Others are equally firm in their view that there was a net gain for the cause of freedom.

In resolving this controversy, I think it would be useful to examine the visit first in terms of what it did not do. There has been no change whatever in the positions previously taken by the United States and the Soviet Union on such major policy questions as Berlin, suspension of nuclear tests, and East-West trade. Mr. Mikoyan brought no new approach to these problems, offered none and did not recede in any respect from the rigid and dogmatic Soviet positions on these vital issues. And we on our side, with our allies not present, would not and did not suggest any changes in the policies which had been previously agreed upon.

Let us turn now to the negative aspects of the visit. First there was the considerable concern that developed in some Allied capitals to the effect that this visit might mark an opening step toward eventual two-power meetings which would be designed to settle the problems of the world. On this score, I believe the results of the visit to which I have just referred should serve to reassure our allies that we reject the arrogant view that we should speak for them without consultation, much less dictate to them.

A second negative aspect of the visit is its possible effect on the millions of enslaved people in Poland, Hungary, and other satellite countries. Mr. Mikoyan's meetings with American officials will no doubt be played up as an indication that we have resigned ourselves to a continuation of their captive status and are about to forget them. I can state categorically that nothing could be further from the truth and that we continue to support the cause of freedom and independence for people everywhere.

A third negative aspect, considerably less serious than the first two, is that Mr. Mikoyan's charm may have lulled some of our people into a false sense of complacency. We shall certainly have to admit that he did an expert job of salesmanship considering the wares he had to sell. But I doubt if any significant number of the American people allowed the charm of his personality to obscure the Soviet record of the past which he helped to make.

Having in mind, as we should, the negative aspects of the visit, let us turn now to some of its positive results. On the plus side, I would place at the top of the list what Mr. Mikoyan learned about us in his 2 weeks in this country and what we in turn learned about him and the cause he represents.

I believe that it was most useful and important that a top Soviet leader should have an opportunity to get firsthand knowledge about the American people, our system of government and our way of life. There is no question but that a great deal of misunderstanding exists among Soviet leaders about the United States.

In the first place, they do not understand our freedom of speech and our willingness to debate foreign policy in public. It is inevitable therefore that when they hear criticism of our current foreign policy from Americans traveling abroad, or in public debate here on such issues as Quemoy and Matsu, Lebanon or Berlin, they tend to conclude that we are far more divided than we are and that there is much stronger public support for a softer line toward world communism than is actually the case.

Second, those whose mental processes have been mesmerized by the dogmas of Karl Marx invariably tend to underestimate the basic strength of the American economy. To them every dip in our economy signals the beginning of the end of capitalism.

Third, because of his belief in the theory of the class struggle, the doctrinaire Marxist tends to think that in the United States millions of American workers are seething with discontent and that they not only want a change in the economic and political system, but that they oppose the foreign policy which is designed to defend that system from its potential enemies abroad.

If Mr. Mikoyan had such ideas when he came here, I can state categorically, based on my conversations with him, that he returned to the Soviet Union with completely different views.

He found Americans overwhelmingly united behind the firm stand of the President and Secretary Dulles against Communist probing actions directed at Berlin and other areas of the free world. He found no significant support whatever among the leaders of either political party for the softer line toward world communism which has been advocated by some of the critics of our policy.

He was noticeably impressed by the economic progress the United States had made in the 22 years since his last visit here and by the obvious strength of our economy today.

He did not find any encouraging signs of progress in the United States toward fulfillment of the Marxist prediction of an inevitable class struggle. On the contrary he admitted almost with grudging admiration that the strongest defenders of the American system, the most vigorous critics of communism, and the most uncompromising supporters of our firm stand in Berlin were not the traditional whipping boys of Communist propaganda, the Wall Street bankers and businessmen, but the leaders of our free trade unions who represented the views of millions of America's wage earners.

I do not mean to suggest that by reason of what he saw he has abandoned hope for the eventual success of the Communist revolution in the United States. He never missed an opportunity to express his supreme confidence that communism would eventually prevail not only in this country but throughout the world.

But he can no longer believe that this will come about because of mass discontent of America's wage earners. In his unexpected visits to typical American homes, he did not find the misery that could be the seedbed of revolution.

How then does he expect his grand objective to be realized in this country? His answer to this question, significantly, was that the American people would turn to communism, not for the traditional reasons of class division and discontent arising from oppression of the masses, but because they would eventually see that the Communist system could do an even better job of producing economic progress than ours. He points to the fact that the Soviet economy is growing at a faster rate than ours today and that inevitably our people would be forced to turn to communism in order to avoid becoming a second-rate power.

We have already witnessed one result from Mr. Mikoyan's visit. Mr. Khrushchev said in Moscow yesterday that based on the report he had received from Mr. Mikoyan on his trip to the United States, there is a possibility of a thaw in the cold war.

I think it is important to set the record straight on this score. The American people and Government are united in their desire for peace. We do not want an inch of territory from the Soviet Union or any other country in the world. We too want a thaw in the cold war because we realize that if there is none we will all eventually be frozen in the ice so hard that only a nuclear bomb will break it.

But there is very little chance for a thaw in a world climate which is constantly subjected to the icy blasts of Soviet propaganda against all those who stand in the way of international communism's drive to dominate the world.

Mr. Khrushchev asks the West to seize the chance for improving relations. He forgets that it is the Soviet Union which began and insists on continuing the cold war. On every major international issue—Berlin, test suspension, protection from surprise attack, the only proposals the Soviet leaders have made have been designed not to end the cold war but to give them an advantage in prosecuting it.

We agree with Mr. Khrushchev that there is a great opportunity at this time for making a breakthrough in reducing world tensions. But this is true only if he sees the wisdom of thawing out the frozen Soviet position of the past.

Mr. Khrushchev can become the greatest leader in the history of Russia if he can see the wisdom of developing policies which will use the splendid resources of his nation not for the purpose of dominating other people but for the benefit of the courageous and long-suffering Russian people who want and deserve more from their hard work than they presently receive.

Let us turn now to some of the things we learned from Mr. Mikoyan. First, after seeing him in action we realize that we can make no greater mistake than to underestimate the ability of those who guide the destiny of the Soviet empire today. In the past 6 years I have met free world leaders in over 50 countries. In several respects, I would have to rate Mr. Mikoyan as the equal of any leader I have met. He has a first-rate mind and a keen, piercing sense of humor. He not only knows his own system well, as we might expect, but he had a mass of information at his command about the United States, our political system, our economic philosophy, and our people.

But even more impressive than his mental ability and shrewdness were certain intangible qualities—a steel-like toughness of character and an almost arrogant faith that his cause was right and that it would inevitably prevail. In this man there was no flabbiness, no softness, none of the uncertainty of the pragmatist seeking a philosophy. He had found in the Communist system the inalienable truth and neither facts nor arguments could shake his faith.

In other words, in the person and character of Mr. Mikoyan the people of the United States were reminded again of the massiveness and of the seriousness of the challenge we face in the world today.

What lessons can we learn from the Mikoyan visit which may have some bearing on American policy toward world communism?

First, what should our attitude be toward visits of this type in the future? As one who has never been accused of softness toward communism—on the contrary my critics believe I lean too strongly in the opposite direction—I believe that an unofficial visit of this type, while it has definite liabilities, is, on balance, in the best interests of the United States and the free world.

But there are certain guidelines which we should always have in mind where such visits are concerned. We are not going to change Communist policy with a smile or a handshake. They are hardheaded realists motivated by their own self-interest. They will respect us only if we stand firmly by our principles and our ideals.

We can do this if we follow two simple rules for visits of this type. Our Government officials and leaders in other walks of life should talk freely with our visitors so that they can know us as we really are. We should always be courteous. But we should never be soft or fawning.

Let me give some examples. The press reported that Mr. Mikoyan was applauded when in referring to pickets who were protesting his tour he said in the Soviet Union "we have freedom from hoodlums." I do not think that enthusiastic applause was the right response to this comment. His hosts would have been wiser had they courteously but firmly pointed out the true American attitude on such incidents.

We should make it clear that we deplore violence or discourtesy to a guest but that we allow peaceful picketing.

They should also have noted that most of those whom Mr. Mikoyan referred to as hoodlums were Hungarians whose relatives and friends were slaughtered by the thousands by Soviet hoodlums in uniform in Budapest.

And they might also have pointed out, as I did at the dinner given for Mr. Mikoyan by the Secretary of State, that the milling thousands who stoned the U.S. Embassy in Moscow and the Communist-inspired mobs who smashed up my car in South America may not have been hoodlums but they certainly were not practicing peaceful coexistence.

I do not agree with those who criticize our businessmen and bankers for entertaining Mr. Mikoyan at lunch or dinner. But I would respectfully suggest that some of them in this instance could learn a lesson from our labor leaders who had to fight to expel Communists from their unions and in the process learned how to deal with them.

They know that a soft and naive approach does not produce results. The Communists respect those who oppose them on principle. They have nothing but contempt for those who are dupes and who can be deceived by what they know are obvious untruths.

This brings us to one of the major lessons we can learn from the Mikoyan visit. I have mentioned how much impressed I was by his broad knowledge of the United States and of our system. This is not unique. I have noted the same characteristic in other Soviet representatives whom I have met in various parts of the world.

On the other hand, I must admit that I have been deeply concerned at the naive attitude and the lack of understanding of communism displayed by some Americans, both in Government and out, who represent the United States abroad. This, of course, is the exception rather than the rule where our Government personnel are concerned, but the fact that this situation exists at all should cause us concern.

That is why I have consistently urged that particularly at the college and university level a far better job should be done in teaching our students the fundamentals of Communist philosophy, strategy and tactics.

The only effective answer to combat a false idea is not ignorance but the truth. Our survival requires that the American people in all walks of life know not only the evils of communism and its weaknesses but also its strength. Only in this way will we be able to develop the public opinion that is needed to support the programs which will effectively meet the Communist offensive.

Americans must know the total nature of the struggle in the world today so that we can meet it with intelligence and resourcefulness.

Let me give an example. At the present time a debate is going on as to what the proper level of our military strength should be in view of the Soviet challenge. There is no question but that the Congress will vote for and the people will support whatever level of military expenditures the best combined judgment of our national leaders indicates is necessary to protect the national security.

But while there will be support, as there should be, for an adequate military program, I predict that we can expect an all-out assault in the name of economy on our programs for technical assistance, developmental loans, exchange and information.

Anyone with even an elementary knowledge of Communist tactics knows we could make no more disastrous mistake. We can be the strongest military power in the world and still lose the struggle for the world without a missile being launched if we don't have the vision to counter the massive Communist offensive in the economic, propaganda and political areas.

The trouble is that too few Americans seem to be able to see the total picture of the struggle against communism. In the years immediately after World War II, there were many in this country who clearly saw the threat of communism abroad but who ignored or failed to see it in the United States. Today, some of those who lead the fight against communism in the United States condemn as giveaways and do-goodism the vital expenditures needed to meet and defeat the threat of communism abroad. Both of these attitudes are shortsighted and completely indefensible.

I recognize that there has been some waste and inefficiency in our information, exchange, and economic programs. But this is a new field for Americans and mistakes are inevitable. We should subject these programs to searching criticism but for the purpose of improving them rather than to destroy them.

In recognizing the necessity to counter the Communist economic offensive let us not make the mistake of letting them always select the battleground that suits them best.

Mr. Mikoyan relayed to me some complimentary comments Mr. Khrushchev had made with regard to a statement I made in London last November to the effect that we welcomed the opportunity to compete with the Soviet Union in waging war on misery, disease, and poverty in the world. But let me repeat tonight what I also said on that occasion:

"Our answer to the Soviet challenge should not stop here. We say—broaden this competition and include the spiritual and cultural values that have distinguished our civilization.

"Material achievements, while necessary, do not meet the deeper needs of mankind. Man needs the higher freedoms, freedom to know, to debate freely, to write and express his views.

"He needs the freedom that law and justice guarantee to every individual so that neither privilege nor power may make any man subservient before the law.

"He wants the freedom to travel and to learn from other peoples and cultures.

"He wants freedom of worship.

"To us, these are the most precious aspects of our civilization. We would be happy if others were to compete in this sphere and try to surpass our achievments."

I also said: "Let us speak less of the threat of communism and more of the promise of freedom. Let us adopt as our primary objective not the defeat of communism but the victory of plenty over want, of health over disease, of freedom over tyranny."

This approach has been criticized as being too idealistic and naive. But let us examine the facts.

I have visited most of the newly developing countries in Asia, the Near East, Africa, and Latin America which the Communists are now wooing so assiduously. Being against this false philosophy and pointing out its evils is not good enough; we must stand for and offer something better. Millions of people in these countries want and deserve a better way of life.

Above everything else these people do not want to be pawns in a struggle between two great world powers. They would like to have our help. But they want us to be interested in them as human beings not just as potential military allies.

What we must do is to present our programs in terms of their aspirations and their aims rather than our own. And we can do this because in contrast to the Communists we do not seek to dominate any other nation in the world today.

We know that what serves their welfare serves ours as well. Because as we help them to acquire the economic and political stability which will assure their independence the cause of free peoples everywhere will benefit.

We must always remember that of all the forces in the world, national independence is the one which is most incompatible with international communism's design of dominating the world.

I think there is one final lesson which we can learn from Mr. Mikoyan which is perhaps more important than all the rest.

No matter how repugnant the Communist philosophy is to us, we must recognize the fact that those who subscribe to it are true believers. And this, rather than the military or economic power of the Communist empire, is the major source of its strength and its insatiable drive toward world domination.

In Mr. Mikoyan we saw a man small in physical stature, but a man of iron determination, fanatical dedication, and superb mental discipline. The soft, the flabby, the naive, the lazy will not win in a struggle with men like this. It is not enough that our cause is just. We must have men who are worthy of that cause.

That is why our great institutions of learning like Fordham have such a tremendous responsibility today. We have heard a great deal about the need of America for scientists and engineers and I would not underestimate it. But America above all today needs in all walks of life the finest leadership our Nation can produce—men of courage, dedication, and moral fortitude; men who have faith in God, a sense of discipline, a belief in American ideals, and a willingness to sacrifice for a just cause.

I am proud to be an honorary alumnus of this great institution which I know will continue to serve the Nation well by producing graduates of this quality and character in the years ahead.

STATEMENT BY NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION ON HIS DEPARTURE FOR TOUR OF U.S. DEFENSE ESTABLISHMENTS IN EUROPE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement by National Commander Preston J. Moore, of the American Legion, made on the day of his departure for a tour of U.S. defense establishments in Europe.

Mr. President, this is an extremely well worded, forceful expression of opinion which shows that the American Legion, among many other segments of population, was not taken in by the propaganda wiles of Deputy Premier Mikoyan on his recent visit.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

National Commander Preston J. Moore, of the American Legion, who left today for an inspection tour of U.S. defense establishments in Europe, replied to an inquiry as to whether his itinerary included Russia, by saying:

"I have no wish to be a party to softening our position on communism through so-called cultural exchanges. Tass, the Russian News Agency, has described the American Legion as 'a huge, U.S., reactionary, chauvinistic organization whose members are veterans, politicians, bank directors, and heads of big corporations.' I don't believe the commissars would extend to the national commander of the American Legion the red carpet treatment which many Americans have voluntarily shown the Russian visitor now in the National Capital."

Of Russian Deputy Premier Anastas Mikoyan's U.S. tour, Commander Moore said, "The United States has been booby-trapped by Mikoyan's alleged good will visit. His reception by high Government officials and by some widely known Americans cannot help but lend false prestige and respectability to the Soviet Union in the eyes of the world.

"In addition, the controlled Russian propaganda mill has been given grist which will be used for weeks to come in grinding out for local consumption new proof of America's warlike intentions.

"Once permission has been given for a visit of such obvious propaganda value as this, the damage had been done. It made little difference whether Mikoyan was greeted with brickbats or bouquets. The only logical position for a loyal American to take was to attempt to ignore his presence in our land. This, many Government officials, civic and religious leaders did by declining to break bread with him or to otherwise receive him.

"However, it appears that except for his official conversations in Washington, Mikoyan has now ended his American visit, and the American Legion has no reluctance now to express its views. We seriously question the wisdom of those responsible for arranging the visit. We believe that one of the purposes of the visit was to cause the free world to forget the rape of Hungary. We believe that Mikoyan was looking for information and help for Russia's lagging chemical industry—help which we devoutly hope he did not get.

Russia owes much of its recent scientific and industrial progress to other visits to our shores—some of them considerably more secret than Mr. Mikoyan's. Cultural exchanges are one thing. Opening the door to vital scientific and military information, American materials and know-how, is something else.

"The only thing to do now is to charge this blunder up to experience and speed him home. We cannot conceive that a similar diplomatic and propaganda mistake will be made a second time. However, if it should be that a scheme for further visits by Soviet bigwigs is brewing in fertile bureaucratic minds, the American Legion urges—drop them now. The American people should not—and I do not believe they will—tolerate another fiasco such as this."

EARLY APPROVAL OF NAVIGATION AIDS FOR WASHINGTON ISLAND, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in these days of challenge and progress we are continually striving to improve our transportation, communications, and related systems to handle the ever-increasing movement of people and goods. At the same time, we are attempting to handle this traffic more expeditiously and safely.

Today, I should like to call attention to a particular need—namely, the erection and maintenance of an adequate fog signal and crib light to provide safe entrance into Detroit Harbor, located south of Washington Island, in Door County, Wis.

Unfortunately, passage through the channel entrance now is extremely hazardous and dangerous, particularly during adverse weather conditions. The erection of the needed light and fog signal has been recognized by the Coast Guard as a necessary and desirable project. Unfortunately, however, until now, it has occupied a place too low on the priority list of the Coast Guard to receive action.

During the year there is a considerable volume of traffic to and from Washington Island. The 800 people living on the island are dependent solely on water transportation. During part of the year, passage through the harbor entrance must be accomplished without aids or even buoy markings. In addition to travel of persons, there is considerable transportation of such items as grain, potatoes, and other farm commodities produced on the island.

I am contacting the Coast Guard to urge that this project be given immediate approval for construction. Meanwhile, I call the attention of my colleagues, particularly members on the Appropriations Committee, to the merits of this project.

Today, I received a resolution, adopted by the Door County Board of Supervisors, urging the erection of this installation. I request unanimous consent to have the resolution printed in the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 60

Whereas the channel entrance into Detroit Harbor located south of Washington Island, Door County, Wis., is hazardous and narrow and difficult to locate under adverse weather conditions; and

Whereas there presently are no adequate signals present at the entrance to provide a safe means under adverse weather conditions of entrance into said channel: Now, therefore, the Board of Supervisors of Door County, Wis., do hereby Resolve, That it recommend to the Coast Guard the erection and maintenance of an adequate fog signal and crib light to provide safe entrance into said Detroit Harbor.

JACK HAGEN,
Chairman, Town of Washington.
HARVEY GRASSE,
Chairman, Town of Liberty Grove.
WESLEY STAVER,
President, Village of Sister Bay.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and exact copy of the original resolution as adopted by the Door County Board of Supervisors on January 15, 1959.

C. HOLLIS BASSFORD,
County Clerk.

ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR FOREST ANTIDISEASE RESEARCH

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today we are faced with the task of preserving, protecting, and expanding one of the Nation's finest resources—its forests.

We in Wisconsin particularly value our more than 16 million acres of treelands.

Unfortunately, forests in the Lake States area, as well as elsewhere, are seriously threatened by blight and diseases.

According to estimates, the annual loss of forests due to disease is tremendous in the lakes region. This damage is calculated to be about 674 million cubic feet and about 200 billion board feet annually. By comparison, this amounts to more than 50 percent of the net growth of our forests. To put it another way, the annual drain on our wood supply actually exceeds the volume of wood cut and utilized by all the forest industries in the Lake States region. This is a deplorable situation.

I am well aware, of course, that with great demands on the budget, it is necessary to examine very carefully each proposal for additional spending. We recognize, however, that there are occasions when timely expenditures will, in the long run, save money. This, I believe, is one of those instances.

Later, I shall, of course, be contacting the Forest Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, to respectfully urge the approval of an additional $250,000 for research on forest disease at the Lake States forest experiment stations. Unfortunately, the 1960 budget contains only about $20,000 for work in this field—a mere pittance in relation to the size of the job to be done.

Yesterday, I received from the Timber Products Association of Michigan and Wisconsin a resolution outlining the tremendous need for additional research in this field. In order to give my colleagues the benefit of the authoritative views of this fine association, I request unanimous consent to have the resolution printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Timber Producers Association of Michigan and Wisconsin, a nonprofit organization comprised of 225 wood producing and manufacturing firms, representing all phases of the timber industry and dedicated to the full development of Michigan-Wisconsin natural resources; and

Whereas a recent outbreak of a potentially serious disease of sugar maple has directed our attention to the catastrophic potential of forest tree diseases; and

Whereas the annual loss of timber destroyed by disease exceeds the volume of timber cut; in addition, lowers the grade of timber now being utilized. Unless controlled, this situation will become progressively worse; and

Whereas the effective control of forest diseases must be based on a sound foundation of knowledge of both the physiology of each tree species and the biology of each disease organism; and

Whereas there is a lack of such fundamental information and it is evident that the forest research program of the Lake States Forest Experiment Station in this area is not presently staffed to provide a sound base of knowledge needed for adequate control of diseases: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Timber Producers Association of Michigan and Wisconsin, in recognition of the needs, recommends a sizable expansion of regional disease research by the Lake States Forest Experiment Station. This would lead to the establishment of an adequate program of research for the study of the physiology of the hardwood tree species and the control of the diseases of all tree species important to the region; noted in our transcript attached; and

That this program should be financed sufficiently to provide necessary programs and facilities and to sustain a staff of scientists trained in the skills needed for the solution of problems involved in forest disease control; and

That to meet immediate needs, an annual increase of $250,000 is recommended; and

That since much of the disease problem requiring attention centers on the northern hardwood type, it is, therefore, recommended that much of the work and necessary facilities be located within the northern hardwood zone of the Lake States region; and

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture and Members of Congress interested in the problems of conservation and the welfare of the northern Lake States area.

(Signed by order of the board of directors of the Timber Producers Association.)

JIM ALDRIDGE,
President.

NEED FOR $29 MILLION FOR CONSTRUCTION WORK ON GREAT LAKES CONNECTING CHANNELS IN 1960

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Tuesday of last week, I indicated to the Senate that I felt that the $23 million appropriation recommended in the 1960 budget for development and deepening work on the connecting channels was absolutely inadequate. Moreover, I stated that as soon as there was forthcoming from the Corps of Engineers information on the amount of money that could be effectively utilized for completion work on the channels, to meet its target date of 1962, I would make that recommendation to the Senate and to the Appropriations Committee.

This morning I received from the Corps of Engineers word that the amount of $29 million could effectively be utilized during the fiscal year 1960 for deepening the development work on the channels. According to the Engineers, this amount would make it possible to meet the completion target date of 1962.

The Nation has a tremendous investment in the seaway, itself, which, as we know, is scheduled for completion in April of this year. Unfortunately, most of the Great Lakes States west of Lake Erie will not benefit from the seaway until the connecting channels are completed.

That is why I believe, therefore, that it would be shortsighted indeed if, after moving forward as rapidly as possible on the seaway, we were now to fail to follow up with the necessary work on the connecting channels. The economy of the tremendous agricultural-industrial complex of the upper Midwest, as well as the Nation, would benefit from making the advantages of the seaway available as soon as possible.

As a followup, I shall, of course, be contacting our colleagues on the Appropriations Committee to urge that the $29 million figure be approved in the 1960 budget.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I wish to state, after consultation with the distinguished minority leader, that there will be no business transacted today, and that when the Senate adjourns today it will adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon tomorrow. The rest of the afternoon will be taken up with the introduction of bills, speeches, and matters of that sort.

INCREASE OF IMPORTS OF CERTAIN MEATS

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, a situation has been called to my attention which I believe deserves the serious consideration of the Congress, as well as of the executive branch of our Government.

Recently the imports of lamb, as well as of mutton and goat meat, have increased sharply. In fact, for the whole of 1957, 1,796,492 pounds of lamb were imported. From January through September of 1958, 5,541,622 pounds of lamb were imported. The figures for the same two periods as relate to mutton and goat meat are equally startling. In 1957, 1,746,740 pounds of mutton and goat meat were imported, and from January through September of 1958, 13,082,138 pounds were imported. Our imports of lamb during the first 9 months of 1958 were 3,745,130 pounds more than the total for 1957.

I ask unanimous consent that a table showing the imports of lamb, mutton, and goat meat for each month of 1957, and through September of 1958, be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. These figures were obtained from the Department of Agriculture.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Imports of lamb and mutton

[In pounds]

	Lamb	Mutton and goat
1957—January	26,049	1,034
February	75,620
March	622,719	28,150
April	229,725
May	126,580	179,344
June	87,594	122,873
July	16,514	1,996
August	18,764	228,453
September	40,351	155,631
October	254,174	171,018
November	194,343	1,500
December	104,059	856,741
Total	1,796,492	1,746,740

[In pounds]

	Lamb	Mutton and goat
1958—January	64,213	505,862
February	175,715	339,911
March	267,601	114,539
April	1,063,852	897,238
May	759,270	3,722,987
June	1,178,291	2,104,170
July	374,982	1,500,623
August	1,270,930	1,980,364
September	385,768	1,916,444
Total	5,541,622	13,082,138

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, this very considerable increase in these imports is of deepest concern to the sheep and lamb industry of the United States. It is anticipated that these imports may be even greater in the months ahead. This is a situation which would have an extremely adverse effect on the sheep and lamb industry in the United States. It is a situation on which I believe the Tariff Commission should act at the earliest possible date. Realistic quotas should be imposed immediately. Imports of this magnitude could result in virtually wrecking the market for those lambs now on feed in the United States, as well as for spring lambs.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION TO VEST EXCLUSIVE ADMINISTRATIVE CONTROL OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE STATES AND THEIR POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, no one can view dispassionately the recent course of events which has resulted in the closing of public schools in various localities of the South without experiencing a deep sense of sorrow.

Neither can one objectively contemplate a future in which those events are allowed to continue to their ultimate conclusion without experiencing a shocking sense of alarm.

The closing of any school anywhere is a lamentable occurrence.

The closing of a public school system is a terrible tragedy.

The destruction of public education in an entire region of our Nation would be an unparalleled catastrophe.

Yet, Mr. President, a realistic appraisal of the facts of the matter affords no conclusion but that that will be the inevitable result of binding the citizens of the South in the chains of circumstance now being forged around them.

And the real losers of such an eventuality unfortunately will be those who will have the least to say about it—the school children of the South and their parents.

The importance of education hardly can be overstated.

With the exception of seeking the salvation of his immortal soul, man has no greater responsibility than seeing that his young are educated to the fullest extent of their abilities and are equipped spiritually and intellectually to achieve mankind's highest destiny.

The American concept of universal education, more than any other factor, is responsible for the greatness which this Nation has achieved. And it very likely may prove to be the determining factor in the outcome of our present life-or-death struggle with international communism.

This critical juncture in our national life is no time to permit divisive issues to rob the Nation of the minds and talents of a great segment of its youth by closing the doors of the public schools in their faces.

It is time, Mr. President, that someone spoke out in behalf of the voiceless masses who will suffer the consequences of such rash action.

From their standpoint there is little difference between those who would destroy public schools with bombs and those who would close them with court orders.

The end result of both actions is the same—to deny the children affected their right to a public education.

Let us put the question in its proper perspective.

The constitutional and sociological ramifications of the decision of the Supreme Court that separate, but equal, education is violative of the 14th amendment have stirred a continuing controversy which has divided the best minds of the country.

There are those who consider the decision to be the law of the land and who are determined to force its implementation regardless of the results.

There are others, like myself, who consider the decision to be outside the scope of the Constitution and who are dedicated to seeking its reversal by every lawful means.

Since there is no likelihood that those two viewpoints ever will be reconciled, it is essential to the future welfare of the Nation that all citizens face up to the two incontrovertible facts of the situation. They are these: First, regardless of whether one accepts it or not, the Supreme Court's school decision is an accomplished fact which will remain so until it either is reversed by the Court itself or is nullified or modified by Congress or the people; and, second, regardless of whether one likes it or not, the overwhelming majority of the people of the South will neither accept nor submit to the forced implementation of that decision and there is no prospect of any change in that position within the foreseeable future.

Therefore, Mr. President, unless it is the wish of the Senate and the Congress that the Nation be torn asunder and the schools of the South destroyed, action must be taken soon to resolve the issue on a realistic, constitutional basis in the light of the facts just stated.

To those who insist that compliance be compelled by Federal force, I would point out the disastrous consequences of such an attempt in Little Rock, Ark.

Federal bayonets are not the answer.

To those who would have the Federal Government finance and operate the schools of the South, I would point out the abhorrent results we have witnessed in our lifetimes from the attempts by Nazi Germany and Communist Russia to control education at the national level.

Federal control of education is not the answer.

To those who advocate inaction and who would sit by idly and smugly while children go without an education, I would point out the unspeakable hypocrisy of using children as pawns of political expediency.

Rearing a generation in ignorance is not the answer.

What, then, Mr. President, is the answer?

That is a question to which I have given 2 years of serious thought and careful study and about which I have sought the ideas and advice of lawyers and laymen throughout my State and region.

In all candor I must admit, Mr. President, that I do not believe any one man, any one legislative body or any one court could devise a comprehensive answer which would cover all situations and meet all contingencies inherent in the present controversy.

That is why I am convinced that the historians of the future will record as one of the gravest and most costly mistakes of our nation the decision of the Supreme Court to make judicial questions out of matters of human relations which the sum total of the experience of mankind dictates should be left to the orderly process of evolution.

But now that the Court has arrogated unto itself the authority to release the unknown contents of this Pandora's box. I submit, Mr. President, that it is now incumbent upon Congress to act to provide for the resolution of the resulting problems and tensions in a way compatible with American constitutional concepts.

That way, Mr. President, lies in the recognition of the fundamental fact that public schools in the United States are local institutions which have been established and are operated and financed by local people on the local level.

That way lies in freeing the Governors, legislatures, and school boards of the individual States to deal with each situation in the light of its own peculiar circumstances and in accordance with prevailing public opinion.

That way lies in removing external pressures seeking to force compliance with unacceptable directives and edicts and rather permitting local school patrons to determine for themselves the manner in which the schools attended by their children shall be administered.

That way can be paved, Mr. President, by the submission by this Congress for ratification by the States of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would read as follows:

> Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution or system is administered by such State and subdivision.

Under such a constitutional provision, the citizens of each State and subdivision would be left free to determine for themselves—in accordance with local conditions and procedures and prevailing attitudes—how and when their schools would comply with the Supreme Court's school decision.

Such a provision would prevent destruction of the public schools of the South and would end for all time any threat from any quarter of Federal control of education.

Such a provision would assure uninterrupted instruction for all children, regardless of their color or place of residence.

Such a provision would permit either retention of the status quo or orderly change as dictated by the requirements of public opinion and make certain that whatever change might take place would be by the constructive process of evolution rather than the destructive process of revolution.

Such a provision would create a basis for unity throughout the Nation at a time when it is vitally important that we present a united front before our enemies.

It goes without saying that the course I advocate will not be acceptable to those who wish to further their own partisan ambitions by punishing the South or to those who prefer for selfish reasons to keep the issue unresolved.

But I submit, Mr. President, that it offers a constitutional solution to a national dilemma which is compatible with everything that is American and affords the one way in which those of us who disagree on the constitutional and sociological questions at issue can meet on firm common ground to serve the best interests of the present and future generations of American youth.

I sincerely believe that there is not a Member of this Congress—regardless of the degree of his personal belief on this question—who could not vote for such an amendment with a clear conscience and in complete consistency with his principles.

As for myself I am and always have been a stanch adherent of the principle of local self-government and local self-determination. I regard it as the cornerstone of our freedom; and there is not an issue in our national life today to which I would not be willing to apply it without reservation.

I cannot bring myself to believe that any Member of the Senate who sincerely desires to see this disruptive issue peacefully and permanently resolved, and who genuinely is concerned about the welfare of all the children of this Nation, would oppose the submission of such an amendment.

I cannot comprehend any thinking individual ever opposing the submission of any proposition to a vote of the people or their elected representatives.

The very basis of our form of government is, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, that it derives its "just powers from the consent of the governed."

That is the crux of the present effort to force a new social order upon the South by judicial dicta—it is being done without the consent of the people directly affected.

The sentiment of the people of my State of Georgia is best summarized by two editorial excerpts.

The first, from the column of David Lawrence in the July 6, 1956, issue of U.S. News & World Report, states:

> The question before the country today is whether communities are free to adjust their school system to meet their own local conditions and local sentiment. Those States which desire to integrate their schools ought to have the sovereign right to do so, and those which desire to operate mixed schools in some counties and separate their schools in other counties, either by color or by sex or by intelligence tests, should have the same sovereign right.

The second, from an editorial by Editor James H. Gray in the November 27, 1958, issue of the Albany, Ga., Herald, reads:

> Surely, if common sense is going to be injected into this question—and there has been too little of that because of the political capital that is being made of the votes of minority groups—this vital principle of consent of the governed must be maintained. Obviously, it can only be safeguarded by careful attention being paid to local conditions and local sentiment. * * * Freedom cannot flourish in a society where Federal force and political whims are the predominant cementing elements.

It is interesting to note, Mr. President, that the 2d session of the 85th Congress in two separate enactments affirmed the local nature of public schools and provided for their control on the local level.

In the National Defense Education Act, Congress declared:

> The Congress reaffirms the principle and declares that the States and local communities have and must retain control over and primary responsibility for public education.

In the Alaska Statehood Act, Congress provided in section 6(j) that "the schools and colleges provided for in this Act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the State, or its governmental subdivisions."

The States of the South, with no disrespect to their sister State of Alaska, feel they are equally entitled to exclusive control of their schools and colleges. The amendment I am offering today, if submitted and ratified, would assure for all time that all States would enjoy that right.

The Supreme Court in its initial decision acknowledged the "variety of local problems" presented by its ruling and instructed the district courts to take "local conditions" into account in formulating their decrees under it. However, when the Little Rock district court sought to do just that last year, the High Court reversed itself and held that integration would have to proceed despite local conditions and the public interest.

The Supreme Court thus has sought to establish itself—without benefit of constitutional or legislative authorization—as a super board of education superior to the Constitution, to Congress, and to the consent of the people. In the course of less than 5 years it has so disrupted laws governing education that every school in the Nation now is subject to the whims of whatever five men happen to constitute a majority of the Court.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that it is the intent of this Congress or the wish of the people of this Nation that the local schools which were paid for and are financed on the local level should be at the mercy of a court which has no knowledge of educational needs or the public interest in fulfilling them.

Of all our public institutions, none are more needful or deserving of stability and continuity than are our schools. It is inconceivable that the younger generation can be educated for responsible citizenship in the future under continually changing rules of instruction.

It is basic in organized society that the rights and wishes of the individual must be subordinated to the dictates of public opinion and the requirements of public interest. And it would be well for members of all three branches of Government—executive and judicial as well as legislative—to reflect upon the fact that the source of all law is the people and that laws and court decisions are enforceable only to the degree that they conform to the "consent of the governed."

It is with the desire to invoke our heritage of the "consent of the governed" that I herewith submit for appropriate reference a constitutional amendment which would vest exclusive administrative control of public schools in the States and their political subdivisions.

Mr. President, I introduce the joint resolution on behalf of myself and the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON], the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senators from Alabama [Mr. HILL and Mr. SPARKMAN], the Senators from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND and Mr. STENNIS], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be read twice by its title and appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 32) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States reserving to the States exclusive control over public schools, introduced by Mr. TALMADGE (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following Article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

ARTICLE —

"Administrative control of any public school, public educational institution, or public educational system operated by any State or by any political or other subdivision thereof, shall be vested exclusively in such State and subdivision and nothing contained in this Constitution shall be construed to deny to the residents thereof the right to determine for themselves the manner in which any such school, institution, or system is administered by such State and subdivision."

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, as I observed earlier, there are those who prefer the issue and there are those who genuinely want to resolve it.

I hope that two-thirds of the Members of the Senate—and of this 86th Congress—count themselves in the latter category, and will be willing to stand up and be so counted.

This amendment is compatible with everything that is American. It is the American way. It is the constitutional way. It is the way of reason and common sense.

I pray, Mr. President, that for the future of education in the United States this 86th Congress will give the people of America, through it, the opportunity to reclaim their constitutional right to run their schools on the local level according to the wishes of local people.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to commend and congratulate my distinguished colleague and friend for his very able presentation of the gravest domestic problem which confronts the American people today. By all odds it is the greatest problem which has confronted the people of the Southern States for almost a century. This problem has been created by the drive to compel integration in the schools of the South.

Mr. President, my colleague is not new in this field. He has labored long and hard with this difficult problem. The proposed amendment to our National Charter, which he has offered here today, is an example of his sincere effort to find some solution to the problem.

Before coming to the Senate, my colleague was a distinguished Governor of the State of Georgia. In that capacity, he sought to devise legal means of providing for the education of the children of that State in the event the Federal courts struck down the separate but equal system of public schools which has prevailed in our State for almost a century.

It was under his able leadership that the voters of my State, in 1954, approved an amendment to the Constitution of Georgia which authorizes the State government to make grants for educational purposes to discharge its obligation to provide adequate education for our children.

I believe that for the benefit of the RECORD I should read that provision of our constitution. It reads as follows:

Notwithstanding any other provision of this constitution, the general assembly may by law provide for grants of State, county or municipal funds to citizens of the State for educational purposes, in discharge of all obligations of the State to provide adequate education for its citizens.

This constitutional provision has not yet been challenged in the courts. In my opinion, it cannot be successfully challenged in any court. It is the principal bulwark in the fight to preserve the constitutional system of schools in Georgia.

In his speech, my colleague has painted a graphic and accurate picture of the developments that threaten to destroy public education in many areas of the South.

I should like to point out that this condition was not created by any action of any substantial number of the people in the Southern States, nor by any officials of those States. It was forced upon us by a high-handed, power-mad Supreme Court which has undertaken to interpret the Constitution of the United States in terms of psychology rather than in terms of precedent and established law.

The present Supreme Court has reversed and nullified numerous decisions handed down by previous Courts which had confirmed the constitutional authority of the States to administer their own publicly supported schools.

I submit, Mr. President, that the recent decisions of the Court amount to nothing less than a fundamental change in the Constitution itself.

The Court has said that the Southern States can no longer operate their schools under the separate but equal doctrine which had prevailed for 80 years and which is based on a social order that long experience had shown to be best for both the white and colored races.

The Supreme Court in its integration decision, with the urgent support of the Department of Justice, has served a heartless and cruel judicial ultimatum upon the people of the South. Those people have been told, in effect, that they will either operate their schools on the basis of forced integration or that they will not operate their schools at all.

Apparently it does not matter to the Supreme Court that this order is contrary to long-established law and all constitutional precedents or that it ignores completely local attitudes and customs.

The decision has been made, as my colleague has so eloquently stated, without any concern whatever as to its effect upon hundreds of thousands of innocent children, both white and colored. The Court is, apparently, perfectly willing to close down the schools and destroy public education in many parts of the South if it gives any weight to its perverted interpretation of the Constitution.

These things may not matter to the Supreme Court, but they do matter to the people of the South. The people of the South are as firmly dedicated and committed to maintaining the system of public education as are the people in any other section of the Nation.

In again commending my colleague, I should like to note that during his administration tremendous progress was made in the schools of Georgia. The State adopted, for the first time, a progressive, overall program for the improvement of our schools. Therefore, my colleague speaks with authority as a friend of public education.

It is not generally understood that southern people generally have made greater sacrifices to establish a public school system for the children of both races than have the people of any other section of this country. The per capita expenditures for public education in the South are considerably higher, in proportion to wealth and income, than in any other sections of the Nation.

As my colleague has said, the destruction of public education would be an incalculable catastrophe and calamity. Public education has become a part of the warp and woof of American life. Yet, today we see a cynical effort to force upon the people of the South a totally unacceptable social order that may well result in the destruction of the public schools in many areas.

I make these comments in order that there may be no mistake as to where the responsibility rests for this appalling threat to public education in a large area of this Nation.

It rests squarely upon those who are seeking to force the integration of the races in the schools in the face of opposition by an overwhelming majority of the people. It rests with the Supreme Court in its bizarre distortion of the Constitution. The Supreme Court has become almost sadistic in its determination to impose its peculiar interpretation on the people of the South. Its rulings have not only brought about the closing of public schools, but the Federal courts have enjoined teachers in the city of Little Rock, Ark., from volunteering their services to assist in the makeshift education of the displaced children during the emergency.

Mr. President, actions such as this make it clear that the Supreme Court has practically declared judicial war on the children of the South in the attempt to force the people of the South to conform to their peculiar philosophy.

The political motivation of the Justice Department, headed by Attorneys General who have not hesitated to play politics with the lives of our children, must bear part of the blame. Part of the blame rests upon the executive branch that sought to force the decisions upon an unwilling populace even at bayonet point.

It lies with the pressure groups and the opportunists who are agitating this grave question for selfish political gain.

Mr. President, regardless of what the U.S. Supreme Court might rule, the Constitution and the laws of Georgia forbid the operation of racially integrated schools. Our State constitution provides that if a system of public schools is to be maintained, it must be maintained on a basis of separate schools for white and colored students.

A provision of law enacted while my colleague was Governor of Georgia expressly forbids the spending of State tax money in any school district that does not provide for separate schools.

Therefore, if the schools of Georgia are closed, it will not be the result of any action of the State government. It will be the result of a lawsuit brought by someone to force integration pursuant to the Supreme Court's 1954 decision.

I again congratulate my colleague for the contribution which he is making and has already made to this great fight for constitutional government and to preserve the States as entities of government. I hope and pray that the constitutional amendment which he, together with a number of our colleagues, has proposed, will serve as a means of reasserting the Constitution and reestablishing the proper construction which was given that document by able judges through many years. If his efforts have that result, it will be the greatest contribution which could possibly be made to the cause, not only of the southern people, but of constitutional government as well. It would forever destroy the threat of Federal domination and control of the school systems of the States.

I associate myself with all that has been said by my colleague concerning the situation which now prevails and about the necessity for congressional action to correct it.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank my warm friend and colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, for the generosity of his personal remarks. My distinguished colleague also has had considerable experience in public life; in fact, virtually all of his adult years have been spent in the public service. He has served as speaker of the House of Representatives of Georgia; he was one of the ablest chief executives in the history of the State; and he has been serving as United States Senator for more than a quarter of a century.

He has correctly stated, in my opinion, not only the disastrous results of the decision of the Supreme Court, but also the determination of the people in a great section of our country to continue to operate their school system in accordance with local needs, local desires, and local demands.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia for the work, preparation, and leadership which he has afforded the Senate in presenting the resolution. I commend him, too, for the affirmative approach he has taken to this far-reaching problem. I think his proposed amendment provides the only sound basis for the operation of our public schools.

A school is like a church, whether it be a Christian church or any other kind of church. Most of its strength and support and the good it does comes from the people who live in the area of the church. That is the spirit of the Senator's proposed amendment, for which I commend him and in which I am glad to join as a cosponsor.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank my warm friend, the distinguished junior Senator from Mississippi, for the generosity of his comments.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, January 22 was the 41st anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

Politically, on the map of the world, the Ukrainian nation has been swallowed up in Communist Russia. But in the minds and hearts of the brave Ukrainian people, of the Ukrainian-Americans and of friends of Ukraine throughout the world, this nation lives.

The history of man is a history of suppression followed by freedom. Nations have been subjugated for years and even generations; but whenever the spirit of freedom beats in the hearts of people, they eventually establish their independence.

In 1918, along with many other peoples, the Ukrainians benefited from the principle of national self-determination enunciated by Woodrow Wilson.

But that freedom was short lived. The Communists overran Ukraine and many other Eastern European nations.

Among those Communists are men who today come to our shores and travel among us, talking of peace. Let us so prepare, Mr. President, that these butchers of yesterday will find such strength, spiritual, economic, and military, that they will never attempt such conquest of America or any other part of the free world.

Mr. President, the time will come when Ukraine will once more be free. Looking toward that day, we in America should do what we can to support the anti-Communist activities of groups like the Ukrainian Congress.

The first modern revolution for self-determination started here in America in 1776. The spirit of the freedom we won then has been and still should be our greatest export.

Let us do everything we can to spread the idea of freedom throughout the world, so that all peoples now suffering under tyranny may one day govern themselves in a world at peace.

MESSAGE FROM SENATOR SCOTT ON UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a message which I sent to Mr. Darmopray of the Philadelphia Chapter of the Ukrainian Congress Committee on January 24 on the occasion of the Ukrainian Independence Day.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1959.

Mr. WALTER T. DARMOPRAY,
Philadelphia, Pa.:

Accept my best wishes on the 41st anniversary celebration of the independence of the Ukraine which you are celebrating tonight at Town Hall in conjunction with similar observances by people in many parts of the free world.

Through these annual observances we call attention to the plight of 40 million Ukrainians who are captives of the Communist Russians. Throughout their long subjugation—when their religious beliefs have been trampled upon, their patriots executed and their relatives imprisoned—the Ukrainian people have never given up their fight for freedom.

In these days when agents of the Kremlin come to the United States, bearing tourist visas and wreathed in smiles, we must remind ourselves that no dealings with the Russians will have real meaning until the enslaved victims of communism again have their rights of freedom and self-determination.

HUGH SCOTT,
U.S. Senator.

ADMINISTRATION OF FARM PROGRAMS BY DEMOCRATICALLY ELECTED FARMER COMMITTEEMEN

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, on August 8, 1958, the Senate passed S. 1436 of the 85th Congress—a bill which provided for the administration of farm programs by democratically elected farmer committeemen.

Passage of this bill was the result of more than 3 years of effort on the part of the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota, chairman of the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Farmer Committees, and others of us who are interested in restoring to locally elected farmers the responsibility for administering the various farm programs in their counties.

It is vital to the success of any farm program that local level administration be in the hands of the farmers who are familiar with local conditions.

Unfortunately, this important bill did not clear the House Agriculture Committee. This was in part due to the busy schedule during the closing days of the 85th Congress, and to an even greater extent due to the unyielding, uncompromising position of the Secretary of Agriculture with regard to certain provisions of this bill.

A number of Senators have joined in introducing S. 662—a bill identical to the one approved by the Senate in the last session. It is our hope that prompt action can come in the 86th Congress.

This legislation is of particular importance to Missouri because of the serious problems created in our State as a result of a series of administrative directives issued in 1953 by the Department of Agriculture. These directives made sharp changes in the county-committee system, which had operated so successfully in the previous 20 years.

The result of the Department of Agriculture's administrative decrees was to strip from farmer-elected county committees much of their administrative authority. They were ordered to hire office managers for administrative control. Furthermore, the State agricultural stabilization and conservation committees began wholesale discharges of elected county and community committeemen. Various other political manipulations caused havoc in the administration of farm programs in Missouri and other States.

The bill we are reintroducing today is the result of extensive investigations into the Department of Agriculture's handling of the farmer committee system. In order to safeguard and strengthen the farmer-elected committee system, the bill:

First. Assigns to State, county, and community agricultural stabilization and conservation committees responsibility for administering the acreage-allotment and marketing-quota program.

Second. Returns to county and community committeemen responsibility for the conduct of ASC committee elections.

Third. Provides that community committeemen shall be elected annually by local farmers in an open meeting.

Fourth. Provides that nominations for county committeemen shall be made at an annual convention of chairmen of the community committees. Additional nominations may be made by petitions signed by 10 qualified farmers.

Fifth. Provides that county committeemen shall be directly elected by the farmers by secret ballot upon which shall appear the names of all persons nominated.

Sixth. Provides that, beginning with the 1959 elections, one member of the county committee shall be elected for a 3-year term, one for a 2-year term, and the third for a 1-year term. In subsequent years, one member shall be elected for a 3-year term to succeed the member of the county committee whose term is expiring. There is no limitation upon the number of terms a county committeeman may serve.

Seventh. Authorizes the county committee to select its own chairman and vice chairman.

Eighth. Authorizes the State committee to appoint temporary county committeemen only when vacancies occur less than 60 days prior to a regular election. All other vacancies, not filled by alternates, are to be filled by a special election.

Ninth. Provides that the county committee shall, subject only to standards and qualifications furnished by the secretary, employ a county office manager. The county office manager shall serve at the pleasure of, subject to the direction and supervision of, and shall execute the policies established by the county committee.

Tenth. Provides that 1 of the 3 members of the State agriculture stabilization and conservation committee shall be appointed by the secretary from nominees elected by the members of the county committees, and that this one member shall be subject to removal from office only for cause.

Eleventh. The bill provides that the State committee, for cause, may remove community or county committeemen from office, but only by majority vote after furnishing such member with a statement of the charges against him, advising him of his rights and giving him an opportunity for a fair hearing at which, if requested by such member, a representative of the Secretary shall be present. Appeals from decision of the State committee may be made to the Deputy Administrator of the Commodity Stabilization Service.

Twelfth. Provides that, for cause, the State committee may, by majority vote, suspend a community or county committeeman, but a hearing on such suspension—as provided in 11 above—must be held within 60 days.

Thirteenth. To be effective January 1, 1960.

Passage of this bill will assure farmers of a greater voice in the administration of farm programs through their own participation in the election of the ASC community, county, and State committeemen.

In addition, the bill establishes safeguards against the recurrence of abuses such as were experienced in Missouri and in other States in recent years.

I urge prompt and favorable action on S. 662.

CHALLENGE OF THE TRADE WAR

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the remarks and recommendations I make to the Senate today are based upon several years of experience as a member of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Appropriations. They are also based, in part, upon observations which I made on a recent 19-day visit behind the Iron Curtain, in Russia, Yugoslavia, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, although this is not a report on that trip, by any means.

I point out also at the beginning of my statement that this is not a scare story. I am not frightened about anything I shall mention today, but I have very positive conclusions that the facts I shall set forth and the trends I shall enumerate are a real challenge to the free world by Soviet Russia and her allies.

I shall first refer to a most recent press report. I read excerpts from the United Press International news ticker, dated today, on the coverage of Mr. Khrushchev's recent speech and report to the 21st Congress of the Soviet Communist Party.

First, Khrushchev said the Communist countries now "stand at the head of all progress."

Then he reviewed the Russian military situation.

Then he said a key task in Russia's new 7-year economic plan is to bring an end to the cold war and a lessening of international tension.

But Khrushchev also called on his people once more to—

First, catch up with and surpass the leading capitalist countries in present per capita output.

Second—and here I quote Khrushchev's words—"insure the Soviet Union's triumph in the peaceful economic competition with the capitalist countries."

Third—and here I also quote Khrushchev's words—"strengthen further the economic and defense might of the Soviet Union."

Mr. President, those statements show unmistakably the trend of the planning to which the resources of that growing, strong nation are to be directed. It is to that sort of challenge that I address myself today.

Mr. President, since the end of World War II, the major threat to the freedom of the Western World has been the Soviet bloc. In an effort to maintain our freedom we have built, and are maintaining, the strongest military machine in history. The Soviet military threat has been checked. Our powers of retaliation are swift and terrible. So long as we maintain this level of defense, and continue our efforts to the utmost of our ability, I do not believe we need fear a direct military attack upon us.

TRADE WAR LAUNCHED

Since the threat of military might has been checked, Soviet leaders have directed their country's attention, resources, and energies toward a new type of warfare against the nations of the Western World—a global trade war.

Many factors in their regimented and atheistic system favor their side. They are moving with increasing velocity into foreign markets throughout the world, under a state trading system of subsidized prices, further reducing their low production and transportation costs.

Throughout the world many new and growing nations are experiencing a great awakening. They have entered the community of important world powers. Their improvement in the economic sense is proceeding rapidly; but they still have far to go, and must, for many years, look to more developed nations for a great part of their consumer goods, as well as heavy equipment. This new power and growth, combined with rising populations, will create in foreign markets an unparalleled demand for various commodities which we have or can produce in abundance. The Soviet Union is laying the groundwork to capture this existing and growing market.

GROWING RUSSIAN CAPACITY

I believe their trade war will include selling or bartering with many countries at low prices, such items as basic raw materials, machinery, and, finally, food, clothing, and other consumer goods. Along with these exports will go their technicians, scientists, propagandists, and others, all of whom will lay the groundwork for anti-Western and pro-Communist concepts. We may expect that they will attain the political importance that attaches to close economic ties.

The U.S.S.R. has solved many of her basic domestic problems involving food, clothing, shelter, and other necessities. Russia's scientific and technical educational program is being pushed, and top-notch scientists are being trained. Lower level technicians and skilled workers with a working knowledge of several languages are becoming abundant.

The Soviet Union's industrial capacity has expanded tremendously in the last few years. An illustration of this is the increase in the production of petroleum. Let me refer, for example, to a table on crude oil:

Crude oil

	(Thousands of barrels)
1940	225,938.5
1945	141,105.4
1950	274,994.3
1955	513,957.2
1956	608,388.0
1957	713,658.0
1958	807,312.0

POLITICAL CONTROL

Their agricultural resources as well as their industrial power and their vast reservoir of regimented workers may be directed by political leaders toward achieving specific production goals. Though other needs may be sacrificed, their national energy and resources may merge to achieve a small number of important basic productive objectives.

In addition, the U.S.S.R. with its completely manipulated economy, can regulate raw material costs, wages, and transportation costs. Russia's goods can be delivered anywhere in the world, at prices their leaders determine. The power of government is thrown behind their price structure.

They can meet and destroy competition in a number of markets, even though their operations are conducted at a loss. Evidently, they feel the political advantage to be gained is greater than any financial loss they may incur.

Their trade war has been launched. Basic materials now being exported include petroleum products, tin, aluminum, nickel, zinc, and benzene.

Also, trucks, tractors, cranes, and machine tools are being sold.

I fully believe that these will be followed by other heavy machinery, and, eventually, common-use items, under a most attractive pricing pattern for their favored customers.

Their trade war is the new challenge of our times. Russia threatens the Western World in foreign markets. We must accept the challenge. We must enter into the competition in one way or another, and we must win.

OUR EXPORTS DECLINING

As these factors favor the Soviet pricing structure, we, on the other hand, have to operate under corresponding disadvantages. Our wage scales, capital investment in industrial capacity, and standards of quality have contributed to high American prices.

Mr. President, these matters are not theoretical. These are hard, basic facts that are realized by one who has come in contact with the facts of life while in the Soviet Union itself, and has had a chance to compare what he saw there with what we have here at home, including our present production system and other items which make up our economy. The conclusions I am relating today are those which have come clearly to the mind of one who has a chance, far removed from the scene of such activities, to make these comparisons.

American industry cannot compete on a purely private commercial basis with artificially deflated prices. Our exports are declining.

Our annual level of exports averaged $13.4 billion for the years 1952–56. They rose to $16.2 billion in 1956, and $19.8 billion in 1957, but fell to $16.2 billion in 1958—a net decline of $3.6 billion. Those figures are taken from the President's Economic Report. This trend must not continue.

We must stimulate our foreign commerce by reducing export prices to a competitive level. Private enterprise cannot do this job alone.

No one wants to turn the clock back to the days of child labor, 12-hour days, and 7-day weeks. No one wants to return to the sweat shop.

It is equally important that we do not sacrifice American standards of quality.

HEARTENING SIGNS

In the broad view of this problem, there are heartening signs. Among these are:

First: Programs for sound capital loans to enable many countries to develop on a sound economic basis their own resources.

I emphasize that I am thinking here in terms of a long-range program—not a "quickie, jumped-up" affair, but a long-range program, to be launched as soon as it reasonably can be. With such a long-range program, we would be able to grow and meet new conditions as they arise.

Second. Currency exchange agreements recently concluded. Convertibility of currency has been a historic problem in all areas of foreign trade.

Third. Technical assistance. We need to share the technical knowledge necessary for the use of American machinery. We should greatly enlarge and extend the technical assistance program of ICA, and bring larger numbers of qualified people, or those with special aptitudes, from other countries to America for training. With considerate treatment here, these people could become missionaries for the American way of life on their return home.

Industrial efforts to make technical advice available in foreign countries should be encouraged, and perhaps we should give thought to a sort of foreign service school for American technicians. This would prepare them for life and conditions in the foreign countries where they are willing to serve. Language courses should be made available freely, and a genuine human interest in the problems of host countries stimulated.

Fourth. American industry has greatly increased investment abroad. Through construction of foreign branches of American companies and partnership with local foreign interests, American capital investment abroad has grown by leaps and bounds in the last few years. The mutuality of benefit is apparent. The industrialization of friendly foreign countries is contributing greatly to their own economic strength and the opportunity for them to observe firsthand the true meaning of private enterprise is having a very favorable impact.

The dollar volume of sales of American owned and partially owned foreign operations exceeded $30 billion last year —nearly twice as much as the total private export program of articles domestically produced.

Serious thought is being given to tax incentives to stimulate this growth. I believe that when a local company decides to invest its money in operations in a friendly foreign government, to risk its capital to undertake the expense of sending technicians and interpreters into foreign lands, some tax consideration should be given. Certainly this proposal should have the most serious consideration in the highest levels of government.

EXPORT SUBSIDY PROGRAM NEEDED

Finally, we need a bold new program.

We should fully explore a new export subsidy program to enable American producers to compete pricewise with Soviet goods in the markets of the world.

We cannot meet artificially deflated Soviet prices in every instance, but we can offer a wide variety of American goods at prices people can afford.

It is primarily to this last point that my remaining remarks are addressed.

COST—SOURCES OF MONEY

Where would the money for such an export price-adjustment program come from?

It is true that we face a budget deficit of $12 billion this year. It is equally true that we have a precarious situation with respect to a balanced budget in 1960.

It is certainly true that I would be among the last to vote for, much less advocate, a new and reckless spending scheme.

Most of the money necessary to finance this program could be literally salvaged by rechanneling funds presently being spent on largely ineffective patchwork grant, aid, and support programs designed to meet a variety of domestic and foreign needs.

Since World War II we have spent over $60 billion on foreign aid.

We spent $1.5 billion for foreign economic aid last year. Originally this program was developed to restore order to the chaos following World War II.

It has long outlived its usefulness. In the main, it is benefiting only incidentally the people of the various nations it was formulated to help the most.

Without belaboring the mistakes of the past, I feel that it is high time that we review our current programs so that we do not repeat these mistakes indefinitely.

A large share of this foreign-aid money could be devoted to a program that would permit us to compete commercially in various countries. Through subsidizing exports on a reasonable basis, American prices could be lowered to a competitive level.

Another source of funds to finance such a program could be derived from the sale of present surplus farm products in foreign countries. In his state of the Union message, the President forecast the cost of the existing program this year:

> Outlays of the Department of Agriculture for the current fiscal year, for the support of farm prices on a very few farm products, will exceed $5 billion. That is a sum equal to approximately two-fifths of the net income of all farm operators in the United States.
> By the end of this fiscal year it is estimated that there will be in Government hands surplus farm products worth about $9 billion. And by July 1, 1959, Government expenditures for storage, interest, and handling of its agricultural inventory will reach a rate of $1 billion a year.

In my opinion, some of the figures quoted in the state of the Union message are too high, because they include items that are not primarily chargeable to the agricultural program. But even with those deductions, the figures would still be very, very large indeed. They show the amount of money now being invested in our agricultural products in a program which stores and piles products up, instead of one which keeps them moving—a program which curtails production and reduces activity within farming lines, rather than one which expands those activities. My reference today is to show a source of money which could be budgeted into a new channel and which could be used in a new movement.

Many of these surplus commodities could be sold through orderly marketing practices in foreign commerce at prices in the reach of the consumers. Thus the benefits to the farmers would be retained and expanded.

While there is existing law to accomplish this purpose, this export program is retrogressing. It could be the pilot program, but it is not accomplishing the vital purpose of putting American products in the hands of consumers throughout the world. As foreign markets are carefully built—no dumping technique is suggested—to their full potential, the domestic need for the present ineffective program will diminish and idle acres returned to production.

I cite these two programs as existing sources of Government funds which could be used to finance a price adjustment program. There are others.

Our private export volume is less than $17 billion annually. Should it be determined that a 30 percent across-the-board subsidy would be necessary, the cost would be less than $5 bilion.

WORLD POPULATION GROWTH

The tremendous increase in world population will greatly expand foreign markets, and the generally rising standard of living will accelerate this growth. The Soviet Union is aware of this, and is moving into many new areas.

In 1950 the world population was 2.5 billion. By 1975 it is estimated the world population will reach 3.8 billion—an increase of more than 50 percent in 25 years. By the year 2000 it is estimated that the population of the world will reach 6.3 billion.

LATIN AMERICA FIRST

Latin America, that part of the Western Hemisphere south of the Rio Grande, is expected to grow most rapidly. Its population is expected to swell from 163 million in 1950 to 592 million in the year 2000—a percentage gain of 263.2 percent. This area deserves a high priority in our consideration of making consumer goods available at reasonable local price levels. It is in this part of our hemisphere that the Russians have directed a large share of their economic activity.

The program I suggest is in no sense a dumping program. There is a major difference in making our prices competitive and flooding world markets with huge quantities of goods at giveaway prices. This program would replace the concept of giveaway or other hidden subsidies imbedded in our present foreign economic aid and other programs.

This program would operate essentially through private enterprise channels. Available funds, world market conditions, the law of supply and demand, and specific needs would control the volume of exports under this program. Applicable Government regulations should be streamlined in order to carry out the program by encouraging the flow of goods in commerce.

BENEFITS OF THIS PROGRAM

First. This program would have many advantages over existing ones. It should meet, in part, the world's needs for basic materials and consumer goods.

This would result because it is a sales program.

People buy only what they need or want. High prices have prevented, and are preventing, the growth of this necessary commerce.

American salesmanship will be challenged to develop and expand markets as well as to open new ones. If competition on a price basis is made practical, American salesmanship will rise to the occasion.

Second. Such a program would meet, in part, many domestic needs:

(a) It would raise our gross national product as our full export market potential becomes closer to realization.

(b) It should broaden our labor force, thereby raising the general level of employment.

(c) It should open new markets for our idle productive capacity, both agricultural and industrial.

(d) It should tend to stabilize domestic prices by enabling industry to apportion indirect costs over a larger number of units of production.

(e) It should increase our income tax revenue and strengthen existing business enterprises, at all levels, regardless of size.

Third. It should meet the need, in part, for a more orderly system of foreign trade through increased domestic production. Such a program will gradually replace the need for many piecemeal Federal subsidy programs which have mushroomed in recent years. It should accomplish the goal of many of these programs in a more efficient and businesslike manner.

We would be using the private enterprise system as the instrumentality of a new governmental program and policy. The individual business enterprise cannot effectively meet unfair competition of a foreign government. Only financial ruin could result to the individual. Our business interests deserve the protection of our Government that this program would afford.

Fourth. Most important of all, it should meet, in part, the need for competing with Soviet goods in world markets.

Recent trade alliances between the U.S.S.R. and a number of other countries have been concluded. These could, in time, ripen into military alliances. There is a political factor involved when the economic activity of one country is closely geared to that of another and larger country. This political strength can grow in proportion to the degree of economic dependence. The Soviet Union is establishing a trade monopoly in certain fields and in certain countries. There is a clear and present danger in the military sense in allowing these new Soviet advances in political trade relations to go unchecked. We cannot regard what is happening throughout the world with indifference and inactivity.

A thorough study of the feasibility of such a broad and comprehensive program must be undertaken soon. Its scope crosses the jurisdictional lines of many governmental departments and many legislative committees.

It is not a partisan matter, nor a regional one. We need the advice and thinking of the best minds in our country on this problem.

We need the considered opinion of leaders from Government, industry, labor, farm groups, and other organizations which have studied the problems this program attempts to meet. We all have a vital stake in the final outcome of this trade war.

In passing I wish to say, Mr. President, that during the time I was behind the Iron Curtain I talked to a good many American groups making surveys and studies of the Soviet system in various phases of production, trade, education, and otherwise. I was tremendously impressed with what the American citizens told me about what they were finding. I think the reports of those groups are extremely valuable. I shall supply for the RECORD later, if possible, the names of those reports which have already been filed by those groups, and information as to where the reports can be obtained by the membership of the Congress and by the public at large. I think there is a great deal of very, very valuable information which is reflected in those reports. I think the reports were prepared in large part by very capable men in their respective fields.

I believe this will open up channels of expanded thought and consideration of the problems on the part of the American people.

Only by thorough consideration and cooperation will we be able to eliminate grave but foreseeable problems at the time of inception. Without a thorough study it is impossible to formulate a policy or write a sound bill.

This trade war is the challenge of our age. We must meet it. We must compete. We must win.

As I have said, this problem transcends the mind of any one person. I know I do not have a solution. I do not believe any one person or any single group of persons at this stage can offer a sound solution.

For the purpose of fully exploring the merits of, and obstacles to, such a program, I am introducing a resolution calling for the establishment of a select committee of the Senate in order to utilize fully the experience and wisdom of many leaders here whose committee assignments and responsibilities have resulted in a specialized interest in various aspects of such a program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 51) submitted by Mr. STENNIS was received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the procedure I contemplate would utilize the experience, the information, the suggestions, and the conclusions of all branches of Government. Even more than that, it would apply to every segment of our own vast economy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That (a) there is hereby established a special committee to be known as the Special Committee on Foreign Trade Development (hereinafter referred to as the "committee"). The committee shall be composed of nine Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate.

(b) The committee shall conduct a full and complete study and inquiry into Federal policies and programs relating to the development of the foreign trade and commerce of the United States with special reference to problems arising from foreign trade activities of nations whose economic activities are conducted and controlled in their totality by national governments. Such study shall include: an inquiry to ascertain ways and means whereby the effectiveness of present programs for economic assistance to foreign nations may be improved;

Including, but not limited to (1) a study of the necessity for, the practicability of, and appropriate means for the effectuation of programs for the making of loans for foreign economic development, and for the rendition of technical aid and assistance for the economic development of foreign nations,

(2) an investigation of ways and means to encourage the investment of private capital in foreign countries for their economic development through the revision of present Federal tax laws and by other means, and

(3) an inquiry into ways and means for the establishment of a national export price adjustment program for the development of the foreign trade and commerce of the United States.

SEC. 2. The committee shall, at its first meeting, to be called by the President of the Senate, select a chairman and vice chairman from among its members. Any vacancy in the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to (1) hold such hearings; (2) sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate; (3) require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents; (4) administer such oaths; (5) take such testimony either orally or by deposition; (6) employ on a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants, and, with the prior consent of the executive department or agency concerned and the Committee on Rules and Administration, employ on a reimbursable basis such executive branch personnel, as it deems advisable; and (7) report to the Senate by bill or otherwise, such legislative measures relating to subjects committed to it for study and inquiry as it shall determine to be desirable.

(b) A quorum of the committee shall consist of five members, except that the committee may provide that, for the purpose of taking testimony, two members, one from the majority party and one from the minority party, shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 4. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

SEC. 5. (a) The committee shall prepare and transmit to the Senate a final report of the results of its study and inquiry, together with such recommendations for legislation or other action as it may deem advisable, not later than December 31, 1959.

(b) Upon the filing of its final report, the committee shall cease to exist.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize again that the proposal is for study and for development of all aspects of the problem, and for the attempted formulation at the national level of a solution of this far-reaching problem.

I think we pass definitely now into a new stage of the cold war which will be fought on the economic front. This is a front on which we are perhaps least prepared. Certainly we are not prepared now. We met the enemy on the other front, as I said in the beginning, but this challenge could go even further. I believe we must try to meet the challenge. We must formulate some plan which will put American goods, American technicians, American workers and free world influence into the economies of many of the nations of this world. If we do not, in the course of not much time—one decade or two decades—we will find that those who represent the other philosophy of life have gotten in on the ground floor; we will find that through economic measures our opponent will dominate and will eventually largely control the thought and political framework of many nations of the world, thus slamming the door in the face of Western ideas and ideals, the American concept of the free enterprise system, and the idea of personal freedom altogether. For that reason I urge we act now to pursue this development further.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in my opinion the distinguished Senator from Mississippi is discussing one of the most important facts of the economic life of the world today. We have had some little taste of the Russian expansion. Under their system the Soviets can absorb, in any line they desire, all the costs, and sell the goods overseas at a price which cannot possibly be matched by any free enterprise system. They can absorb the costs within their own economy. They did it in the field of aluminum not long ago, and sold aluminum at a much lower price than that for which it could be produced and sold anywhere else.

This sort of expansion is at the expense of the lives and income of their people. Either last night or this morning I heard something on the radio about a large shipment of school equipment which was landed in this country from Russia. I was not able to hear all of the Senator's speech, and I do not know whether he discussed that subject or not. It was said that some of the finest and most modern equipment for schools that had ever been seen in this country had been examined by our experts. It was to sell here at about one-fifth of the American price.

When Russia brings her armament program up to the stage she wishes to achieve, and turns full blast into economic warfare, if the free world is not prepared to meet the challenge the result could be chaos, disruption, and destruction, which would be almost the equivalent of a hot war.

I am glad the Senator from Mississippi has devoted his fine mind to the consideration of this very important problem, which will weigh heavily on the lives, incomes, and standard of living of the American people in the days ahead.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Georgia very much. I do not know of anyone who is better qualified to pass judgment on the threat I have been discussing. He is chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, and knows all there is to know about our military program. He is also well versed in the subject of the military threat from the other side. I know that he has studied this problem at the ground level in Russia. He knows their productive capacity. I value his opinion very highly.

I did not know about the illustration he cited with regard to school equipment which recently arrived in this country from Russia. However, when we see the quality of the products manufactured in Soviet factories, and take note of their productive capacity and "know-how," and realize that they are operating in a controlled economy, we see the utter helplessness of private firms, individuals, or corporations under the free enterprise system in competition with whatever the Soviets decide to do in any given segment of the world economy which they seek to dominate.

As I stated earlier, there is an absolute necessity for some kind of national plan to support the idea of competition in world trade.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE CUBAN SITUATION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to make a few comments, as chairman of the Latin American Affairs Subcommittee of the Senate, on the Cuban situation.

I would not have made this speech today had not a colleague of mine in the House, Representative PORTER, from my State, made a speech yesterday in which he referred to me. I feel that his speech must be answered.

Representative PORTER's speech can best be described, in my opinion, as a speech of confession and avoidance. Representative PORTER went down to Cuba upon the invitation of Mr. Castro, supposedly to observe the so-called Cuban war criminal trials, which were held in the sports stadium, to witness a mass meeting in support of the trials and executions, to confer with Cuban leaders. Many of us received a similar invitation. Most of us declined it. I declined it, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows, because no Member of Congress could possibly have any official standing on such a visitation. I felt that if any observation were to be conducted by anyone outside Cuba, it was desirable that it be conducted by some committee or group of the United Nations, which would have some official standing.

I wish to make it very clear that I have an exceedingly high regard for Representative PORTER's sincere interest in Latin American affairs. I share his interest. I have joined him in times past in urging upon the Congress that we stop supporting dictators in Latin America. For a long time past I have opposed American support of the Batista regime, which, in my judgment, was a cruel, Fascist police-state regime, guilty of great terror and the commission of many cruelties upon many of the people of Cuba.

My colleague from Oregon on the House side has made a great contribution heretofore in calling the attention of the Congress and the people of the country to the importance of our ceasing to support dictators. For a long time Congressman PORTER has urged, and I have joined him, that we should support free nations as our foreign policy everywhere.

However, I certainly do not share the view of Representative PORTER, from my home district, in regard to the course of action in respect to executions which the Castro regime has followed in Cuba since the successful revolution. I welcomed the revolution because I have no doubt that it is a grassroots revolution of the Cuban people against the great tyranny of the Batista regime. As I have said in past speeches in the Senate, and now repeat, I think it is still not too late for the new regime in Cuba to regain the good will of free men and women everywhere in support of that regime. I have made it very clear in the past, and I repeat today, that I am opposed to the exercise of any sanctions of any kind against the new Cuban regime.

I do not share the point of view of some in this country who have been heard to suggest that perhaps we should take some economic action against Cuba. What would that accomplish? It would only do great injury to a people yearning for freedom who really need the help of the people of the United States. It continues to be my hope and belief that eventually the fair procedures essential to justice in any free country will be reestablished in Cuba.

It is very encouraging that today's news dispatches indicate that already strides are being taken in Cuba in the direction of establishing the fair trial procedures so essential to the administration of justice. I was the first in the Senate to express displeasure over the firing-squad justice which Castro imposed upon Cuba during the early days following the fall of Batista regime.

In a very brief speech on the floor of the Senate I properly and accurately described those executions as a blood bath.

My Congressman, Representative PORTER, has seen fit to take exception to my description of the executions in Cuba. Thus in his speech yesterday, on the floor of the House of Representatives, he said:

> My good friend and respected mentor, the senior Senator from my State, is deeply respected in Cuba as elsewhere in the world for his unflinching and aggressive liberalism. Senator WAYNE MORSE has referred to the executions in Cuba as a "blood bath" and has stated that "the Castro regime shot many Batista people without a semblance of a fair trial," although he adds, "I haven't any doubt that a fair trial would have found them guilty."
> Senator MORSE is chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs. He has always been an outspoken foe of dictators.

Later in his speech, the Congressman states:

> My hometown newspaper, the Eugene Register-Guard, approved Senator MORSE's words "blood bath" as accurate and states that the world wishes Castro well but that "he cannot keep the favor of decent people around the globe if he sanctions the same terrorist tactics that the world deplored in the deposed dictator, Batista."
> What about these charges?
> Are they true?
> Are Fidel Castro and the new Cuba fast returning to the same old strong man situation?
> No, I do not believe that there has been any blood bath in Cuba nor do I believe that Castro and his 26th of July movement are denying fair trial to accused war criminals, although I believe their procedures should be much improved.

GENEVA CONVENTION SHOULD BE CASTRO'S GUIDE

In passing I should like to say, as a lawyer, that the Congressman is familiar with a plea by way of confession and avoidance. As I shall show before I have concluded these remarks, the procedures to which the Congressman refers not only should be much improved, but an entire set of fair trial procedures should be established first of all in Cuba. The basic guarantees of fair procedure which are recognized by civilized nations in treaty form, such as in the Geneva Convention, should recommend themselves to the Castro regime. I referred at length to them in the Senate the other day. They are the minimum essentials of fair trial procedure. I recommend to my Congressman a reading of the Geneva Convention. I pointed out in my speech on the floor of the Senate the other day in discussing the procedures provided for in the Geneva Convention that they constitute basic rules for fair trials that free people everywhere will understand and approve. They should have been substituted by Castro for his so-called drumhead or rifle squad justice in Cuba.

The Congressman goes on to say:

> My opinion is based on 2 years of observing the Cuban situation.
> What is a blood bath?
> I would say it was irresponsible, indiscriminate killing of persons. As for drumhead trials or lack of elementary due process, I suppose that means the accused not knowing exactly the charges against him, not being confronted with the witnesses against him, and not having a proper opportunity to defend himself.
> Persons critical of the trials and executions are not, in my judgment, fully informed, often through no fault of their own. They do not realize the magnitude and high morality of the revolution.

Later on in his speech, the Congressman says:

> The rebels tortured no one. They shot no prisoners. Even after victory there is no report of looting or violence by them. Theirs is a crusade for an honest and terror-free Cuba, not a conquistadorial drive for wealth and power. Priests and Protestant ministers were attached to the rebel forces. Batista's army had no chaplains at all.

HOW MUCH BLOOD MAKES A BLOOD BATH?

My Congressman can shout his denial from the housetops and claim that there was not a blood bath in Cuba under Castro. However, I think that a procedure which resulted in the death of more than 200 Cubans by summary rifle squad executions at the command of a few rebel officers following at best a kangaroo court mockery of justice is properly identified with a blood bath. It is an example of inhumanity to man.

I made no statement on the floor of the Senate in regard to what was happening in Cuba until I had been thoroughly briefed, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin-American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The fact is that Castro did not take those steps which are necessary for fair trial procedure before more than 200 Cubans were executed.

The Congressman quotes me as having said, "I haven't any doubt that a fair trial would have found them guilty." I did say that. Surely my Congressman, the able lawyer that he is, would not want us to believe that the guilty are not entitled to a fair trial procedure. Deliver us from any such advocacy of star chamber proceedings. One of the complaints of our Revolutionary Fathers was against the star chamber procedures of the British Crown.

My Congressman knows that there always is a grave danger that summary executions may result in a mistake of killing someone who is innocent. The danger is always great in time of mob hysteria and cries from the masses for vengeance. Even after long trials in capital punishment cases in the United States we sometimes wake up to the horrible danger of a miscarriage of justice resulting from a mistaken identity or a conviction based upon perjury or other grievous error committed in the trial.

In all probability Castro has executed men who were guilty of great cruelties under Batista but that is not any justification for his rifle squad summary executions. Suppose he made just one mistake? Suppose just one innocent person was murdered by his blood bath.

How can he justify under the moral law such a bloodletting? Furthermore, do Castro and my Congressman really believe it is humane and moral to deny to those believed to be guilty of war crimes, or any crime, the safeguards of fair trial procedure?

I should like to say on that point that the Congressman's analysis reminds me of that old fallacy of false assumption. In effect, he sets up this fallacious syllogism consisting of false assumptious premises. The Castro regime denies that there was any blood bath in Cuba. The killings do not meet my definition of a blood bath. Ergo—there was no blood bath in Cuba.

Of course, it is interesting to read my Congressman's conclusion in regard to blood baths after he sets up his false assumptions as to what took place at the time of the executions.

He states:

> No; I do not believe that there has been any blood bath in Cuba nor do I believe that Castro and his 26th of July movement are denying fair trial to accused war criminals, although I believe that procedures should be much improved. What is a blood bath? I would say it was irresponsible, indiscriminate killing of persons.

Let us take a look at what the facts show. The facts show that more than 200 alleged Batista war criminals were shot by rifle squads. The executions started almost immediately after the close of the revolution. Many of the victims had no trial, unless my Congressman wants to claim that bringing alleged war criminals before a few officers of the Castro regime and, in anything but a calm setting, have charges of crime shouted at them and being told in a matter of minutes that they were guilty, constituted a trial. The next step in this travesty on justice was that in an exceedingly short period of time, each victim was taken before a firing squad, before an open grave, and shot. To say that such a procedure did not produce a blood bath is incredible. The granting of time for preparation of one's defense is essential to a fair trial. Adequate time for the preparation of the prosecution and the preparation of the defense were lacking in the early executions by the Castro regime.

As I have already said, I have no doubt, Mr. President, that possibly all—although there is always the probability that an innocent person might be executed—of the persons executed were individuals with bad records under the Batista regime. Is that any reason for not following fair trial procedures? To the contrary, an essential to justice is a fair procedure in the trial of the guilty as well as the innocent. That is what the Geneva Convention is all about. Under the Geneva Convention, when we are dealing with war crime prisoners, in most instances we are dealing with guilty people.

But civilized nations have recognized fair trial procedure as essential to the administration of justice, which was simply nonexistent in the early Castro executions. That is what I protested.

I do not know how much blood has to be shed for my Congressman to describe something as a blood bath. But when more than 200 persons are summarily executed by a rifle squad, I am proud that history will record that here on the Senate floor I protested and called it what it was—a blood bath.

Later in his speech, my Congressman said:

> I have followed these reports closely, and I have yet to see a specific allegation that even one accused war criminal was denied elementary due process or that a particular one of them was unjustifiably executed. I asked veteran newspapermen in Habana if they knew of any such instance. They did not. They were convinced that the men executed deserved conviction and that they had had a fair opportunity to defend themselves at their trials.

I again recommend to my Congressman a reading of the Geneva Convention. Figuratively speaking, I would take him by the hand and lead him through the guarantees of that Convention. What are they? First, that the accused is entitled to a bill of particulars or an indictment. Second, that he is entitled to counsel. Third, that he is entitled to the right to cross-examine those who testify against him. Fourth, that he shall have a minimum of 2 weeks in which to prepare his defense.

Under the Geneva Convention, a war prisoner cannot be brought to trial in less than 2 weeks. Oh, how salutary that procedural protection is. What a clear proof it is as to the soundness of a point I am heard to make so often, namely, that the substantive rights of free men and women can be no better than their procedural rights. Only through fair procedure can we really protect the substantive legal rights of free men and women.

If, under the Geneva Convention civilized nations, in treaty agreement, think it is essential that a minimum of 2 weeks be allowed for the preparation of one's defense, then I am at a loss to understand a statement by a Representative in the U.S. Congress that he does not know of a particular case in which the elementary principles of due process were denied in connection with the Castro executions. In the absence of the procedures of the Geneva Convention in the Castro trials, I know of no element of a fair trial which was present in any of those executions.

The Geneva Convention goes on to require that after the time for the preparation of the case and the presentation of one's defense, then appellate procedures shall also be made available. Of course, this conception is not new in American justice.

Cuba is now under the leadership of the great judge who is now the President of Cuba, Manuel Urrutia, who, under the Batista regime sat on a court in Cuba. It is a great paradox that when some rebels were before that court, and a majority of the judges of the Batista court followed a course of action which, in the opinion of Judge Urrutia violated justice he, to his everlasting credit, dissented. Following the dissent, he had to flee to the United States. It is an interesting paradox in light of the summary firing squad justice the Castro regime subsequently adopted.

I have said, and repeat today, that in my judgment that if that great judicial mind of the President of Cuba is allowed to work itself upon the administration of justice in Cuba, corrections will be made, and made quickly, along the lines of the fair procedures for which I have pleaded from the time I made my first utterance in protest of the inhumanity to man practiced in the early executions by the Castro regime.

AMERICAN EXAMPLE WORTH FOLLOWING

There is a very interesting, historical case in our own country which is worth pondering in regard to this subject matter. There was a well-known war criminal trial after the American Civil War. Although about a million persons were killed before that war was over, the country had as President a great humanitarian who made the noble Christian plea of charity for all. President Lincoln urged a binding up of the wounds; he pleaded for an understanding of the vanquished. It is a great chapter of applied Christianity in the glorious history of this Republic.

But there was a very significant war criminal trial following that war. It involved Captain Wirz, who was in charge of the Andersonville Prison, in Georgia. The charges and allegations against him were very serious as to the cruelty, neglect, and horrors which were practiced in that prison on many thousand Union troops. Twenty-five thousand Union soldiers died in that prison. It was decided to bring Captain Wirz to trial. It is an interesting chapter in American legal history.

Then too, a great public clamor for justice by vengeance—the eye-for-an-eye and tooth-for-a-tooth doctrine—was being emotionally and hysterically urged by many persons against Captain Wirz. Unfortunately, such emotions were allowed to run rampant in Cuba by the Castro regime and then offered as an excuse for the executions on the claim that the people would take the law into their own hands. But not in our country following the War of the Rebellion.

Federal troops were supplied, and they gave Captain Wirz complete protection as he was taken from Georgia to Washington, D.C. Some 3 months after his arrival here, he was finally brought to trial. Every one of the fair procedures for which I have pleaded in the Senate with respect to the Cuban situation was followed by the U.S. Government in the Wirz trial even in a military court-martial proceeding. Captain Wirz was given fair procedural safeguards under military law. Finally, after a 2 months' trial at which 2,000 pages of court record were taken, a final verdict of guilty was sustained upon appeal, and he was hanged.

Even in a court-martial proceeding fair trial procedures are to be expected. I am the last person to whom anyone should talk if he wants to support the premise that it is necessary to have kangaroo-court procedures in military proceedings. I deny that for military justice there must be drumhead trials; that there must be speedy executions by firing squads in order to do justice in a situation such as existed in Cuba or existed in the United States following the War of the Rebellion.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield for a brief observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe the Senator from Oregon might well have included the trial, before a military tribunal, of Atzerodt, Lewis Payne, Mrs. Surratt, and David Herold, all of whom were hanged after a trial before that tribunal; and it is well to note that Dr. Mudd and one or two other minor alleged conspirators were sent to the Dry Tortugas for long terms of imprisonment.

Mr. MORSE. Yes; we also had some exile cases.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not think the Senator from Oregon—being a distinguished and able lawyer—could read the record of those trials and then could say that the trials of the so-called conspirators in connection with the murder of the great Lincoln were conducted other than as drumhead courts-martial; and in that connection, Reverdy Johnson, a distinguished Senator from the State of Maryland, withdrew from the trial because of the gross unfairness of that military tribunal of the Federal Government—of which, incidentally, Lew Wallace, the author of "Ben Hur," happened to be one of the members. I do not refer to that in extenuation of what the Senator from Oregon is discussing with reference to drumhead courts-martial; but certainly I do not think all of the due processes were invoked in that case.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from Missouri. I do not contend that justice has always been administered impartially and without occasional abuses in the United States.

Mr. HENNINGS. No.

Mr. MORSE. We have had such cases in respect to some of our courts-martial. But I wish to point out that the Wirz case is recognized in history as the noted war-criminal trial following the rebellion.

Of course, there were other court-martial trials. The Senator from Missouri has referred to some of them, particularly the trial of Lincoln's assassins. History records that some of the procedures of those trials were not as judicious as they should have been. Some of the criticisms of those court-martial trials led to some reforms in the military law of this country.

In fact, during the last 14 years, since I have been a Member of the Senate, there has been a substantial rewriting of the law of military justice in the United States. At the time I was a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and took an active part in drafting legislative reforms in connection with military justice.

I point out that the American trials of Wirz and Lincoln's assassins occurred nearly a century ago. Yet even the notorious cases in our own country of injustices that crept into some of our court-martial trials do not compare with the type of firing-squad justice that prevailed in Cuba immediately following the fall of the Batista regime.

Mr. President, at this time I wish to discuss the procedural safeguard which I believe is raised by the type of case the Senator from Missouri has mentioned. The point I wish to stress is the need to establish civil courts for the administration of civil justice at the earliest possible hour following an upheaval such as the one which has occurred in Cuba. I am glad to learn from today's news dispatches that apparently there already is a trend in that direction in Cuba, and I should like to believe that it shows wise leadership on the part of President Urrutia of Cuba.

I wish to say that my colleague, Representative Porter, of Oregon, in his speech yesterday on the floor of the House of Representatives pointed out that he gave certain advice to Castro and the other Cuban leaders. I wish to commend him for that advice. Although I am critical of Representative Porter in respect to lending himself to seeming support of what happened in connection with the Cuban bloodbath, I wish to pay him high compliment for the advice he says he gave to Castro and the other leaders. I say that even though I believe the advice he says he gave Castro also is interesting in connection with my pointing out that his defense of Castro is pretty much a plea of confession and avoidance.

In his speech, Representative PORTER said:

> The trials should be slowed down. Cuba is at peace; and civil judges, not military judges, should sit on the bench.

Mr. President, at this time I am making the point that great confidence will be restored to the administration of justice in Cuba when it is announced to the world that those arrested for crimes committed under the Batista regime will be tried by civil courts and civil judges, and that in those trials the rules of fair procedure to which I have alluded can be put into operation. I join Congressman PORTER in his recommendation that civil courts rather than military courts should conduct the trials involving Batista war criminals.

Representative PORTER also said:

> More time should be allowed for the preparation of defense cases, although I have yet to hear or read of any protest on these grounds made by an accused war criminal or on his account.

Mr. President, Representative PORTER loses me there. I wish to say that the procedural guarantee of adequate time for preparation of one's defense must be available before people can use it. But the sad fact is that this procedural guarantee was not available when the bloodbath executions took place in the days immediately following the revolution.

But I am glad that I find myself in agreement with my distinguished colleague from Oregon who serves in the House of Representatives when he points out that more time should be allowed for the preparation of defense cases.

In the House of Representatives, Congressman PORTER also said:

> I urged these changes in policy in writing before I went to Cuba, and personally when I was there to President Urrutia, Castro, and Secretary of Justice Angel Fernandez.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. But is it not true that when a man is being tried, he makes motions only when he thinks he will be heard or when he thinks he can accomplish something thereby?

Mr. MORSE. Not only is that true, but let us face the ugly fact that Castro's victims were confronted with a hysterical, psychological situation which existed at the time that they were subjected to summary rifle-squad executions.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Of course, that is true. I wish to say that the procedure being followed there is wrong; and as we observe what continually happens elsewhere in the world, as well, it is just too bad.

Mr. MORSE. I fully agree with my friend from South Carolina. Mr. President, in closing I wish to say that as chairman of our subcommittee, I shall continue to support programs which seek to aid the people of Cuba and programs which seek to strengthen democratic processes in Cuba. But so long as I am chairman of the Latin American Affairs Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, when any country to the south of us, or for that matter anywhere else, practices procedure based upon the type of inhumanity to man which characterized the executions by means of the Castro proceedings following the fall of the Batista regime, then, as a Christian true to my faith and in a position of responsibility, I intend to continue to raise my voice in protest. I shall do so in the hope that those in a position of leadership in such a country will see the soundness of the moral principles which I advocate relative to such a situation.

Mr. President, all I have said is that the procedures adopted by Castro violate the moral law. When nations violate the moral law, eventually they pay the penalty of losing the respect and confidence of free men and women everywhere.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at the close of my remarks today the transcript of a radio address on the Cuban situation which I broadcast to Oregon today.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Radio broadcast of Senator MORSE, Jan. 27, 1959]

THE CUBAN REVOLUTION

Fellow Oregonians, on this broadcast I shall talk about Cuba.

Seldom have political events in a Latin American country so captured the attention and interest of the American people as has the recent revolution in Cuba led by Fidel Castro.

Our radio and television have been full of Fidel Castro, and his followers, and the trials they have been holding as so-called show-case trials.

It is unfortunate that the American press and public ignored events in Cuba for so long prior to the revolution, because what is occurring now has a background of 7 years of terror and oppression.

As most of you know, I am chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. In that capacity, I have followed closely the story of the dictatorship in Cuba under General Batista. I have known for many years that Batista ran the most vicious kind of government imaginable in Cuba.

Under his regime, Cuban prisons were filled with citizens seized off the streets or in the middle of the night by Batista's police; in these jails they often were subjected to dreadful and inhuman brutalities, and many of them were finally murdered. Others were shot down on the streets by the police without any pretense of accusation or charges, or any kind of trial.

These Cubans were either real or imagined opponents of the Batista government. His was a police state of the worst kind, and he dealt with his opposition in the traditional method of the police state—he simply liquidated his opponents.

It was because I knew what kind of regime he was running in this little country just 90 miles from the coast of Florida that I began over 2 years ago calling for an end to any American aid to Batista.

Under various treaties and international agreements, we have furnished military aid to governments in South America for the purpose of strengthening the overall hemispheric defense against Communist aggression. Under such an agreement, Cuba has been receiving grants of American weapons since 1952—the very year Batista seized the Cuban Government and took over as its head of state.

When the rebels under Castro began to operate as an organized force in eastern Cuba, it became evident to those of us who took the trouble to find out that much of our American military aid was being used by Batista to suppress the rebels. American planes and bombs were used against Castro's forces, despite the assumption when they were sent that they would be used only for general hemispheric defense, and in conjunction with similar forces from other nations in the Western Hemisphere against a common enemy.

In 1957, I supported a whole series of amendments to the mutual aid bill designed to curb the wholesale handout of military aid. Not all these amendments were successful, but we did reduce somewhat the total amount of military assistance to Latin American dictators.

In 1958, I was even more specific in my objections to the President's request to Congress which continued the same old practices of handing out military equipment and supplies without adequate controls on how it would be used.

When the bill was before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I stressed again that I, for one, in Congress, did not want any continuation of American military aid to dictators in Latin America or anywhere else. In my individual views on the bill, I made the following statement:

"The way military assistance has been carried out in Latin America has a great deal to do with the difficulties into which we have fallen in that part of the world. What this administration seems unable to realize is that not every revolutionary is a Communist."

It was my amendment to last year's bill that required that internal security problems shall not be a basis for sending military aid to American republics, and that it must be based entirely upon hemispheric defense needs.

There is no doubt that my protests and those of other Members of Congress helped immeasurably in terminating all American arms shipments to Batista. These arms shipments ended last March, and not any were sent after that date.

Later, in the Senate, I voted enthusiastically for an amendment to the mutual security bill offered by Senator PROXMIRE of Wisconsin to terminate all aid to Batista's fellow dictator, Trujillo, in the neighboring Dominican Republic. Unfortunately, that amendment did not carry. And, I might add that it is in the Dominican Republic of General Trujillo that Batista has been given refuge from the rebels.

I recite this record to you because the apologists for the mass executions in Cuba are trying to dismiss the American critics of those executions as Johnnies-come-lately who never had anything to say about Batista but now have plenty to say about Castro. That certainly is not true of the senior Senator from Oregon, and I might also add that had not some friends of Cuban freedom spoken out as we did months ago, American weapons might still be going to a Batista government in Cuba

Those of us who rejoiced at the demise of General Batista have, for the most part, been appalled in turn by the terror turned loose by Castro. Within hours after Batista fled the country, the firing squads of the rebels were lining up dozens of members of the police and army who had been accused of crimes by the local populations.

These men had no trials whatsoever; in less than 3 weeks, Castro's execution squads killed 250 accused persons in what amounted to a horrible blood bath. When many of us protested against this drumhead justice, we were told, in effect, by the spokesmen for the rebels that everyone in the community knew of the guilt of these men and so it was perfectly fair that they should be executed at once.

We were also told that they had in fact received trials, and that if the new government had not carried them out, the local populations might have taken matters into their own hands and exacted retribution themselves.

These, of course, are not reasons for what was done, they are but excuses. For one thing, it is one test of any new government that it control the population over which it claims jurisdiction, and that it is able to maintain law and order. Castro could not ask for recognition unless he had control of the population. This was patently a feeble excuse for his executions.

Secondly, it is a fact that the men executed by the Cuban rebels did not have fair trials, and I cite as my authority the American intelligence services in Cuba whose job it is to report to Washington on just such things. Some in Congress have tried to defend the executions by saying—"Oh, I have not heard of anyone being executed without a fair trial." Such persons simply do not know what they are talking about—they do not have the information on events from our intelligence authorities. When they tell the people of Oregon and the Nation that there has been no blood bath in Cuba, they would have you forget that more than 200 people have been shot by rifle squads without a fair trial.

My answer to them is that there is no fair trial without an impartial judge, without a written record of proceedings and testimony, without a defense counsel, without the right to call witnesses in one's behalf, and free, I might add, from hysteria and an atmosphere of vengeance. In Cuba, few or none of these procedural protections have been found in the so-called trials that preceded the executions.

I do not for a moment deny that the police under Batista committed horrible crimes against the people of Cuba, nor do I suggest that they should be allowed to go free or escape punishment for what they did.

But executions on the basis of mob vengeance makes the punishment as bad as the crime. That is no way for a new government to earn and hold the respect and support of freedom-loving people. Many of us who were the most anxious to see Batista go have not been encouraged to look hopefully to Castro after his defense of mob justice.

I was one of nearly a dozen Members of Congress who were invited down to Havana to "see for ourselves" as the Cubans put it, that their trials were both public and fair.

My answer to that invitation was as follows:

"I respectfully decline your invitation, and in keeping with my sincere friendship for Cuba suggest that you use your good offices to have the Cuban Government invite United Nations to send official observers to Cuba to observe and report to the world the procedures which have been followed by the new regime in past executions and those procedures that are followed in connection with future executions.

"As a visitor to Cuba I would not have any official standing, but I should think that the Cuban Government would welcome the presence of an official party representing the United Nations.

"Let me make very clear I think the criminals of the Batista regime should be brought to justice; but a quickly imposed sentence to death before a firing squad ordered by a so-called military trial at a time of high tension immediately following a successful revolt is not compatible with civilized justice.

"My plea has been for orderly trials before civilian courts with adequate time for thorough preparation of both prosecution and defense and full public disclosure of the evidence that establishes the guilt. Such a procedure would strengthen the respect of world opinion for Cuban justice. It would leave no room for doubt about the determination of the leaders of the new Cuban Government to administer a government by law in whose courts both the innocent and the guilty are guaranteed fair procedure essential to a fair trial. Justice based upon a spirit of vengeance is justice defiled. It is not a demonstration by way of a mass meeting that Cuba needs, but a rededication to the spiritual significance of the mass. This is no time for a display of political drama, but a time for the leaders of the Cuban Government to demonstrate to all of us who have been their friends and want to continue to be their friends that fair trial procedures for which the new President of Cuba has so nobly stood in the past will henceforth prevail under his administration."

That was my message to the new Cuban Government. I believe it was the best way to exercise a moderating influence upon its leaders without lending the appearance of approval of the trials which would result from witnessing them.

An example I have urged the people of Cuba to follow is that of our own Civil War. That war of rebellion raged over half the American Continent for a full 4 years, and a million people died in it.

Yet, when it was over, there was no blood bath. There was one war-crime trial, however, after the rebellion, for crimes similar in many respects to the crimes perpetrated by Batista's army and police. The one war criminal tried after the American Civil War was Capt. Henry Wirz, commander of the infamous Andersonville military prison in Georgia. Between February 1864 and April 1865, not 20 or 30 or 40 people, but 25,000 Union soldiers died in Andersonville prison. Most died from prison diseases like gangrene and scurvy, caused by criminal neglect on the part of the prison's managers, but others died by Wirz' own hand or upon his orders.

Yet Wirz was escorted north for trial by Union troops, who protected him from assault by angry mobs on several occasions. He was presented with a list of written, formal charges; a military court-martial of nine officers was appointed; the prisoner was allowed to select two persons as his counsel. One hundred and fifty former inmates of the prison were called by the prosecution to testify to the commander's crimes, and over 2,000 pages of written manuscript were taken.

The trial did not start until 4 months after the close of the war; it lasted 2 months, and Wirz was hanged in November, nearly 8 months after the end of the war.

That was in the middle of the 19th century; many of the circumstances were different, it is true, but it is evidence that a government can have justice prevail where the will to do so prevails.

It is my prayer that this kind of real justice will soon be made to prevail throughout Cuba.

As a friend of Cuba, I continue to hope that its new government will institute the fair procedures in its war-crime trials that are essential to a free and democratic state.

DEATH OF HON. GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, OF MISSOURI

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, there is on the desk a resolution which has come from the House relating to the death of our late beloved and respected colleague, Representative GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, of the State of Missouri. I ask that the Chair lay the message from the House before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolution (H. Res. 134) was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
January 26, 1959.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of ten Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I submit a resolution on behalf of my junior colleague from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] and myself, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 64) as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate at the conclusion of its business today adjourn until 12 o'clock meridian tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] as the committee of two Senators provided for in the second resolving clause.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the State of Missouri has lost a great man, a man born of Missouri soil, a man who drew his living from Missouri soil, a man who represented in the House of Representatives of the United States those friends and neighbors of his who also lived by the soil.

I refer, Mr. President, to the Hon. GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, Representative in Congress from Missouri's Fourth District. Representative CHRISTOPHER passed away last Saturday. His death is a loss to the State of Missouri—a loss to the United States of America.

Representative CHRISTOPHER was born near the small Bates County town of Butler, Mo. Except for a few years of his life, he made his home on a Bates County farm. At the time of his death he still operated a 975-acre farm in Bates County. He was, in short, a farmer, and he had the interest of all farmers, everywhere, in his heart.

He served in the 81st, 84th, 85th, and 86th Congresses as a member of the House Administration Committee and the Committee on Agriculture. He served in the executive branch of the Government as Assistant Director of the agricultural conservation program. His service in these tasks was peerless.

Representative CHRISTOPHER, however, leaves a legacy to Missouri. He leaves seven fine sons and two fine daughters. Their loss is shared by his many friends both at home and here in the Nation's Capital.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, it is with a deep sense of personal loss and sadness that I rise to pay tribute to GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, my distinguished colleague from Missouri, and Representative from the Fourth District in Missouri.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER served the people of his district and his State well. His first interest was agriculture. He was a firm believer in the family-sized farm as the backbone of our rural economy.

No one was better qualified to speak on agricultural affairs than GEORGE CHRISTOPHER. He was born on a farm near Butler, Mo., and except for a short time in his early years, spent all of his life farming in Bates County.

He knew his people well and he served them well.

As a Member of the 81st, 84th, 85th, and 86th Congresses, his was a respected and authoritative voice in the House of Representatives.

He had truly earned the tributes paid him when he was recognized as one of our truly great farmer-statesmen.

Along with respect for his knowledge and experience, all who knew him shared in admiration of his personal courage.

It was not only the courage to fight for what he believed in, but also the courage to serve his people in the face of a physical handicap that would have put lesser men on the sidelines.

A year ago GEORGE CHRISTOHPER underwent an operation for the removal of a leg. Nevertheless, he remained an active Member of Congress, and last summer and fall waged a strenuous campaign for renomination and reelection.

No finer tribute to his courage and dedication could have been given than the overwhelming vote which he received last November—the greatest victory of his career.

Yes, Missouri and the country have lost a dedicated and courageous public servant.

And all of us in the Missouri delegation have lost a personal friend and a distinguished colleague.

His service to his district and to his country will be long remembered.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of section 6, Public Law 754, 81st Congress, the Speaker had appointed Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER, of California, as a member of the National Historical Publications Commission, on the part of the House.

The message also informed the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of section 2, Public Law 75, 84th Congress, as amended, the Speaker had appointed Mr. O'NEILL, of Massachusetts, as a member of the Boston National Historic Sites Commission, on the part of the House.

PAN-AMERICAN PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, on repeated occasions I have taken the Senate floor to bring to the attention of the Congress the implications involved by our failure to assume our just responsibilities toward our friends and neighbors to the south of us.

Latin America is an area beset with economic problems. Its people, looking to us to the north of them, cry out for leadership and guidance in their hour of turmoil.

They are a proud people.

They are a people who seek no charity, and want none.

They are a people living in an area of unlimited natural resources and wealth, seeking nothing other than to be treated as equals in the councils of state.

Today, artificial barriers prevent a maximum degree of unity, cooperation and understanding—all of which must of necessity exist between us.

Herein lies the crux of the problem in our relations with our friends to the south.

Our failure up to the moment to assist effectively in removing these artificial barriers has inadvertently aided in providing a fertile field in which the seeds of the atheistic philosophy of communism can flourish—and the Communists in launching their economic offensive in the area wasted no time in seizing upon this unfortunate and needless situation.

Time is now running out, and the hour is at hand when flowery phrases professing friendship must be replaced by bold, forthright and courageous action.

We have two choices—either we must assist Latin America to solve its economic problems or else we must be prepared to suffer the consequences, and the consequences could be disastrous, not only to the Western Hemisphere but also to the entire free world.

The area has been crying out and still cries out for us, their friends, to furnish leadership. It is a role which rightly falls on our shoulders. It is a responsibility which we must assume and cannot shirk.

Unless we can furnish leadership in our own backyard, it is difficult to comprehend how we can be expected to carry out effectively our role of world leadership.

Last year I proposed a seven-point program designed to assist immeasurably in solving the economic problems of Latin America. This program is as follows:

First. We must adopt a long-range, workable, effective and stable trade policy between the United States and Latin America.

Second. There must be assurance that Latin America will receive a fair proportionate share of the development loan fund for effective economic assistance.

Third. There is a necessity to restore the Latin American special economic development assistance fund to assist in promoting health, education, and sanitation projects in the area.

Fourth. Is the institution of an adequate and effective student-exchange program.

Fifth. Is the creation of, and our participation in, an Inter-American Development Bank, long desired by the area.

I am happy to report the administration has now seen fit to accept at least that particular recommendation.

Sixth. Is the appointment of an Under Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs.

Seventh. Changes in our existing tax structure are needed to encourage a greater flow of private investment in the area.

Today I should like to add an additional point to this program, and that is the encouragement of the United States in bringing about the creation of a Pan American Parliamentary Association, whose membership would be comprised of legislators of the highest legislative bodies of all countries in the Western Hemisphere. Such a body could aid immeasurably in breaking down the artificial barriers founded on quicksand, which today are preventing a maximum degree of unity, cooperation and understanding in this hemisphere. It is a positive act which can be taken promptly, and one which, without doubt, would produce constructive results.

I am introducing today a resolution to express the sense of Congress that a Pan American Parliamentary Association should be established, and to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences of such Association.

A similar resolution has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative ANFUSO, and I am hopeful that the Members of Congress will see the merits of this proposal and favorably act without hesitation on it.

The Department of State, I am informed, looks favorably on this proposal as do many of the Latin American countries, as a means by which the strained relations existing today, created solely by unfounded distrust, can be eradicated.

The destinies of the countries of this hemisphere are bound up in each other. That being so, we must move swiftly to effectively penetrate the obstacles which stand in the pathway toward prosperity and peace.

Unless we successfully accomplish these goals in this hemisphere, we cannot hope to successfully meet our responsibilities toward the free world. We must not fail.

Mr. President, I send the joint resolution to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) expressing the sense of Congress that a Pan-American Parliamentary Association should be established, and to authorize participation by the United States in parliamentary conferences of such Association, introduced by Mr. SMATHERS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLOTT subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to comment on the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] with respect to Pan-American affairs. It has been my feeling for a long time—and perhaps I feel peculiarly this way because we have so many people of Spanish-American origin in my own State—that the Spanish-American countries, and in fact the countries of the entire Western Hemisphere, are going to become of greater importance to us in the United States and to the world in general in the years to come.

Yesterday, several of us had an opportunity to talk at length with the great Governor of Puerto Rico, Gov. Muñoz Marín, who has done such an outstanding job in developing in a few years a country, which is like Cuba and many other Latin-American countries, from a backward, poverty-stricken nation to a place where it is now able to purchase from the United States $750 million worth of imports every year.

This is only one of the many significant things that can happen in the development of our South American, Latin American, and, indeed, our entire hemisphere relations. They have been ignored. We have taken them too much for granted.

It will be my purpose to support every move in Congress in the direction of strengthening our bonds of friendship, because, after all, no matter what State we come from, we have many ties of every nature with the people of Latin America, and we want to maintain and strengthen them.

ADMINISTERED PRICE INFLATION

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly has completed 3 days of hearings on administered price inflation. The following is a summation of the testimony given to the committee.

In opening this session of hearings I stated that they had a twofold purpose: first, to obtain a more detailed appraisal of the nature of the current inflation, and second, to secure an outline of alternative public policies available to meet this important problem. The testimony of Dr. Nourse and Dr. Means, and particularly Dr. Means' charts, have most adequately met the first purpose. If there was doubt before in anyone's mind that the inflation of the last few years has been principally one of price increases in administered price industries, that doubt should now be completely dissipated by those charts.

This in turn has certain important implications for public policy, which were brought out by the witnesses during the hearings. The point was stressed repeatedly that fiscal and monetary policies, while able to act as a brake on a demand inflation, are not adequate to halt an administered price inflation. Indeed, it was argued that recourse to a tight money policy during an administered price inflation may be injurious to small business. Dr. Means stated that the tightening of the monetary policy by the Federal Reserve Board 2 years ago in an effort to combat the present inflation resulted in the depression out of which we are climbing all too slowly. Similarly Dr. Nourse stated fiscal and monetary policies could halt the present type of inflation only by being applied to such a degree as to bring about a severe depression.

However desirable a balanced budget is the point was made that the achievement of a balanced budget is not the full answer in halting this type of inflation. The reasoning was that the large firms in concentrated industries could and probably would continue to raise their price regardless of whether the budget was balanced or unbalanced. As to the achievement of a stable price level, which is one of the objectives set forth in the President's economic message, Dr. Nourse pointed out that there was no need to amend the Employment Act to attain this objective since, in his view, it was already implicit in the act, and that in any event the attainment of full employment should not be sacrificed to the securing of a stable price level. Dr. Means noted that the achievement of a stable price level could actually be harmful if it was merely the result of price increases in administered price industries being offset by price decreases in competitive industries. Referring to the period 1953 to 1958, he called attention to the fact that price increases in steel, electrical machinery, and other administered price industries were to a considerable extent offset by decreases in prices of farm products, textiles, miscellaneous goods, and other competitive areas. He noted that this divergent type of price behavior represented in effect a transfer of income from the competitive to the administered price industries.

As to the second purpose, the testimony of the various witnesses has provided a number of different routes to the solution to the problem. While they were in agreement as to the nature of the present inflation, they were in considerable disagreement as to the best ways and means of halting it. It was precisely this diversity of opinion which we sought in asking these particular economists to testify. Not only are they eminent men in their own right, but they are representative of the principal different points of view as to the best ways of dealing with the problem.

In trying to summarize the different remedial approaches which they have presented, I shall, of course, have to engage in a certain amount of oversimplification which I hope does not do too much violence to their essential views. Dr. Nourse's attitude seems to be that principal reliance must be placed upon the force of competition; that, however, concentrations of power have developed in industry, in labor, and in farm organizations which sometimes prevent the force of competition from adequately protecting the public interest; that he does not believe in either trust-busting or union-busting as a solution to the problem; and that rather the Congress should concern itself with developing a general principle on the basis of which legislative means of preventing abuses of concentrated power can be devised.

Dr. Nourse was particularly concerned with the virtually complete exemption which has been extended to farm organizations in recent court decisions, with the potential harm to the general economy that can arise from the farflung and widely disparate activities of such a labor organization as the Teamsters Union, and with the power that is held by a large conglomerate corporation such as General Motors, which is a leading producer in not one but a whole series of different industries.

Dr. Lewis declared that economizing by admonition, which he referred to as creeping admonitionism, is self-contradictory and meaningless; that the antitrust laws, while they are generally desirable and should be continued and strengthened, are too slow and not sufficiently effective to deal with the nature of the monopoly problem as it now exists; that concentrated forces are not held in check by their opposition to each other because the opposing interests often do not countervail but rather gang up on the consumer; that even if there were such a thing as a corporate conscience it is difficult to see how it could be applied in the public interest to specific price and production decisions; that the workable competition doctrine is too vague to be meaningful and that inevitably we will have to come to accept some form of direct controls.

Dr. Lewis endorsed the use of indirect price restraints of the nature that were rather successfully employed in the early years of World War II before the direct involvement of the United States in the war, and drew a distinction between such specific measures and general admonitions of businessmen to be statesmen. In this connection Dr. Lewis endorsed the bill of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] to require large corporations in concentrated industries to give notification before instituting price increases.

Dr. Means urged, first, that we get rid of the idea that the big corporations are private enterprise and recognize rather that they are collective enterprises; that we develop standards by which the performance of these great collective enterprises can be judged; and that we develop a system of incentives and a framework of laws, rules, customs, and opinion which will tend to induce corporate management to make their price and other policies conform with these standards. While not believing that the breaking up of large enterprises is either an effective or desirable solution to the problem, Dr. Means held that in general the antitrust laws are desirable and should be strengthened and vigorously enforced.

Dr. Adams urged that the Government itself bring to a halt its own activities which promote concentration and destroy competition; that the focus of the existing antitrust laws be against industrial giants rather than petty offenders, such as Louisiana strawberry farmers or Maine lobstermen; that, where they protect concentrated power from foreign competition, tariffs should be repealed; that Congress enact a new law patterned after the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935 to deal with excessive conglomerate power not based on efficiency; that the patent laws be revised so as to provide for revocation in cases of abuse or nonuse, and that no patent rights be granted to a private firm on an invention developed at public expense.

As his central proposal, Dr. Adams stressed the necessity of trust busting in its literal sense as a means not only of retarding inflation but actually of spurring efficiency and technological progress.

Dr. Edwards was of the view that the basic approach to the problem should continue to be through the antitrust laws which, he felt, should be strengthened and supplemented in a number of respects. Specifically, he recommended the establishment of a top-level governmental office to bring to the attention of other agencies the need for conducting their operations in such a way as to promote rather than injure competition; that as a necessary tool for effective enforcement better information be secured, including particularly the conduct of a continuing survey of the levels of concentration on an industry-by-industry basis, the securing of basic information on profits, sales, and assets on all corporations of appreciable size, and the obtaining of information showing the relationship of subsidiary and affiliate companies and their operations to their parent corporation; that the merger law be strengthened by providing additional funds for enforcement, by enabling the Federal Trade Commission to secure preliminary injunctions, and in the case of larger mergers by making them illegal with the burden of proof shifted to the merging companies; that the tax laws be amended in such a way as to promote voluntary spinoffs; that new statutes be enacted to prevent formation of tight communities of interest among different corporations through joint stock ownership, interlocking directorates, and similar arrangements; and that the test of section 2 of the Sherman Act be changed from the present standard of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize to the holding of dominant power.

In the future we hope to hear from other disinterested experts and from representatives of business, labor, farmers, and consumers. But at least we have before us now a delineation of the principal routes which are available and of the problems and difficulties of each.

Witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee during this 3-day hearing included Dr. Edwin Nourse, formerly Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers; Dr. Ben Lewis, Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio; Dr. Gardiner C. Means, Washington, D. C.; Dr. Walter S. Adams, Michigan State University, East Lansing, Mich.; Dr. Corwin Edwards, University of Chicago.

PROPOSAL TO MAKE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] have sponsored Senate bill 75, a bill to make the REA an independent agency.

Much has been said on this floor in the past 2 or 3 days about the Rural Electrification Administration. I say again, as I have said before, that some of those who are serving it and talking for it the loudest really have in mind something entirely different from the purposes which they are discussing.

One of the things which I believe is in the minds of some people is to find a discreet, but perhaps orderly, way in which to divest themselves of the directorship of Mr. David A. Hamil, who, I am very proud to say, is from my own State. Mr. Hamil has done perhaps the most outstanding job in REA of any administrator since that particular governmental function was created.

Not only in my State, but throughout the United States, the amount of money which has gone into the initiation and expansion of REA projects under his tutelage and guidance exceeds by far anything that has ever been done before.

I invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that he has done such a remarkable job. If it should develop later that the purposes of some of the bills to which I refer are perhaps different from those for which they are ostensibly introduced, Senators will have notice of some of the background reasons, and will be able to assert themselves and effectively argue the issues at that time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be a cosponsor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] to Senate bill 75.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SERVICES RENDERED BY DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, a longtime friend of mine, Edward L. Omohundro, is Chief of the Veterans' Employment Service, which is a part of the U.S. Employment Service, located in the Department of Labor Building here in Washington, D.C., appointed to such position in April 1955. He had previously very competently served several years as State veterans' employment representative for Colorado.

He was prominently active there in various veteran and civic associations. He and I were active together in the Young Republican National Federation. He is an unusually patriotic and social-minded American.

Recently there has come to my attention a speech that he made on October 7, 1958, during a dinner engagement in Chicago, Ill., which sets forth so many pertinent facts that I desire to have it printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OMOHUNDRO PRAISES DAV'S RECORD IN CHICAGO ADDRESS

(The following address, submitted for publication by National Director of Employment Relations John W. Burris, was delivered by Edward L. Omohundro, Chief of the Veterans' Employment Service, at a DAV dinner held in Chicago on October 7)

PENSIONS OR PAYCHECKS

Pensions or paychecks?

This is a question that is important to both the disabled veteran and the Government.

The veteran population of this country has exceeded 22½ million and continues to increase.

On March 31, 1957, 1 out of every 8 of these 22½ million veterans was drawing some form of disability compensation or pension.

Not only does this represent a financial problem to the Government but also to the disabled veteran himself.

You can best realize how difficult it would be to try to live on these compensation or pension checks by figuring out personally how you could get by if you had an income of one-fourth or one-half of what you now spend.

The disability compensation checks of only the most severely disabled, i.e., the paraplegic, the totally blind and the multiple amputees, even approach this figure.

The choice for the others is a job, substandard living conditions, or increased compensation or pension.

If the decision is left to the disabled veteran we can be confident that the answer will be—a job.

This is substantiated by a survey conducted several years ago by the service officers of the DAV.

Employment was listed as the greatest single need by the more than 2,000 disabled veterans polled, with hospitalization second, homes third, and increased compensation or pensions placing fourth and last.

Unfortunately, the answer does not rest solely with the veterans of this country.

It must be shared by the governmental agencies that are responsible for the vocational rehabilitation and placement services, the employers of the Nation who have the jobs, and last but not least by the organized veterans groups.

Many of you may wonder how the veterans organizations and the Disabled American Veterans, in particular, can help provide the answer, and why it is necessary for them to do it.

After 38 years of service to America's disabled war veterans, the Disabled American Veterans is looked upon by Congress, the various Government agencies and by the employers of this country as the organization whose primary function it is to look after the disabled veterans' interest and to represent them, individually and collectively, whenever the occasion arises.

The interest which the Government agencies and the employers show in the employment problems of disabled veterans may well be in direct proportion to the interest and enthusiasm displayed by the departments, chapters, and the entire membership of this organization.

The elected and paid officials of the Disabled American Veterans have many interests, many programs, and many problems demanding their time and attention.

To say that one is more important than another is to invite an argument.

If Capt. Cicero Hogan, national director of claims, was asked to name the most important program, his reply would probably be claims.

Maj. Omar Clark and his staff would maintain that the legislative program was the backbone of the organization.

Who could say that either one of these directors would be wrong?

In fact, most members of the organization would agree that they are both right for the DAV needs a good claims program—and, of course, a successful legislative program.

By the same token, the DAV needs a good employment program, a program that takes advantage of the many services available through governmental agencies and private organizations, a program that has an active employment officer and committee at every level, national, departmental, and chapter.

For a number of years workers in the rehabilitation and employment fields have sometimes been disturbed at what appears to be a lack of interest on the part of veterans organizations in employment.

Fortunately, the picture is not all dark. Some of the major veterans organizations have very active employment divisions.

The DAV under the able leadership of the national director of employment relations, John Burris, has taken great strides to improve employment opportunities for disabled veterans.

For the past 9 years the DAV has sponsored the awards given to the winners in the national essay contest.

As you know, these awards are presented to the boys and girls by the President of the United States during the annual meeting of the President's Committee on Employ the Physically Handicapped.

Not only does the DAV furnish the awards but they also bring each essay winner, with a chaperon, into Washington expense free.

While in Washington the winners and their chaperons are entertained by the DAV and have an opportunity to visit the many places of interest in our Nation's Capital as well as meet with many national figures.

Each one of the essay winners returns to his respective community with a better insight of the type of organization the DAV maintains and also a better insight as to what a great country America is.

I wish that every employer in the Nation would have an opportunity to read some of the prize winning essays submitted by boys and girls throughout the United States.

If that were humanly possible, I am sure that we would no longer have problems in placing disabled veterans and also the oftentime objective of Gen. Melvin J. Maas, past national commander of the Disabled American Veterans and chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Physically Handicapped, could be carried out, and that is—General Maas would like to work himself out of a job.

Much credit must be given to Millard Rice, director of your DAV service foundation for supplying calendar cards for distribution through the Veterans' Employment Service to the employers of the Nation encouraging them to hire disabled veterans.

Of all veterans organizations, I know of no service officers who are better trained than those of the DAV.

But this statement should not be interpreted as a recommendation that your service officers should devote their time to soliciting jobs for disabled veterans or that departments or chapters should set up little employment offices of their own.

The U.S. Employment Service and the State employment services have the facilities and the trained personnel to do that job.

To illustrate, during the past 12 months the Employment Service has placed better than 1¼ million veterans, of which the Illinois service placed 68,149.

We feel that this record has been achieved not only through the efforts of our State VER, Howard W. West and his two assistants, Wallie Ernst and Charlie Greene, but also through the outstanding interest in the disabled veterans program displayed by Mr. Sam Bernstein and Mr. Walter Parker, of the Illinois Employment Security Service and their staffs.

Also during the past 12 months the Employment Service has placed nearly 105,000 disabled veterans.

This brings the total number of placements of disabled veterans to well over 1,250,000 since World War II.

What I do suggest is that every department and every chapter be just as concerned when one of its members needs a job as they are when a disabled veteran needs medical treatment or a claim processed.

The elected and paid officers of the DAV should be as well acquainted with the manager of the local employment office as they are with the manager of the Veterans' Administration regional office.

They should feel as free to call on the veterans employment representative in their local employment office when they have a veteran with an employment problem, as they are to call on a contact or adjudication officer about an insurance or claims problem.

And most important of all, the departments and chapters should be as concerned with and expect just as good service from the local employment office as they look for, and demand from the Veterans' Administration regional office or hospital.

At the same time, departments and chapters should be quick to recognize good service and let the local office managers and the State employment service directors know that it is appreciated.

As stated earlier, many chapters have already given citations to local employment offices.

No doubt, during the coming year, many other employment offices will warrant this recognition and the chapters of the DAV should be the first to give it.

The officers and the members of the DAV are among the most energetic workers and leaders on State and local committees for employment of the physically handicapped.

The DAV is one of the most active organizations in promoting the observance of National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week.

By doing this you are insuring that disabled veterans will continue to share in the benefits of this program year after year, just as they have since 1945.

If the DAV has failed in anything, it has not been in its programs or our established policies, but rather in letting your communities know what the DAV does, what it stands for and why.

Perhaps those of us who are so intimately concerned with the various programs of the DAV have forgotten the importance of telling other people, including members of our own families, what we are doing and why.

The DAV many times finds itself criticized and opposed on one phase or another of its activities.

I suppose many of you feel as I do when that happens because we believe so deeply in the DAV that we would much rather have others agree and work with us.

However, when you consider the nature of this organization and the wide range of activities it carries on, it just isn't reasonable to expect unanimous agreement.

The fact that the DAV is disputed from time to time is a pretty good sign that it is doing a job—and is doing it effectively.

Yes, all veterans organizations are continually being criticized by what I like to term misinformed groups who are daily increasing their pressures to dilute all veterans benefits and preferences.

And my answer to these misinformed critics is from the words of Gen. George Washington, taken from one of his messages to Congress in which he, at all times, pleaded for justice for his troops.

"It is not indeed consistent with reason or justice to expect that one set of men should make a sacrifice of property, domestic ease and happiness, encounter the rigors of the field, the perils and vicissitudes of war to obtain those blessings which every citizen will enjoy, in common with them, without some compensation.

"It must also be a comfortless reflection to any man that after he may have contributed to securing the rights of his country at the risk of his life and the ruin of his fortune, there will be no provision made to prevent himself and family from sinking into indigence and wretchedness."

You and your grand organization, in helping disabled veterans to become physically and vocationally rehabilitated, are converting them from community liabilities into community assets.

THE AREA REDEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Mr. COOPER, Mr. CLARK, Mr. BEALL, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. LANGER, Mr. HART, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MORSE, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. DODD, Mr. YARBOROUGH, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. MCNAMARA, and Mr. MUSKIE, I introduce for appropriate reference the area redevelopment bill. This is a bipartisan approach toward the establishment of a badly needed American point 4 program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 722) to establish an effective program to alleviate conditions of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in certain economically depressed areas, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The express purpose of the bill is to establish an effective program to reduce substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in certain economically depressed areas of this country and to maintain a continuing high level of economy throughout the United States. The fact is recognized that many of our communities are suffering substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment and that this condition has existed for a number of years. This economically unhealthy situation causes hardship to many individuals and their families, and impairs the national welfare by wasting vital human resources. To overcome this problem the Federal Government in cooperation with the States, should help these areas of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment to take effective steps under private initiative and enterprise in planning and financing their economic redevelopment. In doing this the communities, industries, enterprises and individuals in the areas should be able to achieve lasting improvements and increase the domestic prosperity of the areas by the creation of new employment opportunities.

The responsibility of the Federal Government to help assure maximum employment is now a generally accepted principle. It is a part of the law of the land through the enactment of the Employment Act of 1946. The persistence of unemployment and underemployment in many areas should be combated by the Federal Government, not only because it causes great human suffering in these areas, but also because these conditions are a threat to the general welfare of the Nation. The bill which we offer recognizes this responsibility to the areas of chronic unemployment and underemployment and provides for a program which will help the people in such areas to expand the base of their economic activities so as to alleviate this long-term problem. The bill proposes a program which will stimulate these areas to help themselves.

The need for this legislation has been recognized both by Congress and the executive branch of the Government for several years. I began to work for this program as early as 1954, and I have been active in the cause ever since. In the most recent Economic Report to Congress the President stated:

> Despite the forward economic strides of the Nation since the war, some communities have suffered substantial and persistent unemployment, when measured against national experience. Federal assistance to these communities is required not only to mitigate the hardships of individuals and families, but also to provide for the use of underutilized resources, to the enhancement of the national welfare.

The President has given at least verbal support to this program in his Economic Reports to the 84th, 85th, and 86th Congresses.

Many bills have been offered to the Congress to meet the needs of these hard hit areas and the Congress has reacted favorably to such a program. The Senate has on two occasions passed bills which a group of us sponsored and which were similar to the present bill. During the 84th Congress, in 1956, the Senate passed S. 2663, and again in the 85th Congress both the Senate and the House passed S. 3683, another area redevelopment bill which was substantially similar to the present bill. The President, however, by a pocket veto, killed S. 3683 and prevented it from becoming law.

The need for this legislation is more apparent today than during the Senate session of 1956, and even that of 1958. Reports from the Department of Labor on unemployment in May of 1956 disclosed 23 major labor market areas as having substantial labor surplus which is defined as 6 percent or more of the work force covered by unemployment insurance, and 65 smaller labor market areas located in 23 States were so classified. The most recent reports of the Department of Labor, for November 1958, show that 80 major labor market areas, spread throughout 25 States, had 6 percent or more unemployment in their labor force and no less than 188 smaller labor market areas throughout 35 States also had over 6 percent unemployment. I include the list compiled by the Department of Labor of the cities and areas which are facing the problem sought to be remedied by this area redevelopment measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the material may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] These areas were not originally a part of the regular area labor market reporting and the area classification program of the Bureau of Employment Security. They now, however, appear every 2 months.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a program for the redevelopment of these areas should be flexible and adaptable to the diverse needs of the many communities, both industrial and rural, which suffer from chronic unemployment and underemployment. A comprehensive program to aid chronically depressed and low-income areas will mean much to the people—the men, women, and children—of these areas. The statistics from these areas show decreases and exhaustion of savings deposits, bank deposits, and increases in unemployment compensation, public assistance, and county aid which is distressing to the taxpayer who must pay them, but which mean far more to the men and women who have no jobs or whose skills are being squandered by this lack of income-producing employment. And to the children of these communities these figures mean a future with little or no hope, with increased juvenile delinquency and waste of the next generation. These depressed conditions, continued over a long period, mean also the gradual disintegration of the community and all its physical resources built up over the years—schools, stores, hospitals, banks, office buildings, homes, churches, and all of the community services which were acquired at great expense and which are now wasting away. All too often, when the people of the area move away in search of jobs elsewhere, duplicate facilities must be built. And these duplicate facilities may have to be built with the help of Federal subsidies. In a vast, expanding America, it is not right that these once proud communities with close family ties should be permitted to die upon the vine. It is far better that the Congress meet the responsibility placed before it and take the positive type of action proposed in the area redevelopment bill. I emphasize that we are not trying to freeze the population in its present locations, but we are trying to reduce unnecessary blight and decay.

The bill I am introducing, with the welcome support of so many other Members of the Senate, provides such a program. It does this by establishing an Area Redevelopment Administration which is authorized by means of loans for new and expanded business and commercial enterprises, by loans for public facilities geared to industrial development, and by grants for such public facilities tied to local self-help capabilities to help these redevelopment areas to help themselves. Technical assistance for redevelopment, retraining facilities, retraining subsistence payments, and industrial rebuilding in urban renewal areas are also provided in this measure for these economically hard-hit areas.

Many of these pockets of depression which this bill would aid have existed for a period of years. Some are of long duration. Industries upon which they once depended for a living have declined. Industrial replacement programs have not made up for the jobs lost. Textile mill towns and cities, coal mining regions, railroad shop communities, farm machinery and ordnance centers, cut-over country, and underdeveloped rural areas are typical of such drains in our pools of opportunity.

Courageous local efforts to bring in new industry or to expand existing businesses have been made, but these have in the main failed to meet the urgent needs. On the basis of testimony presented at the hearings before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, it is clear that the communities which have been hit by economic misfortune have not been content to sit idly by in the face of adversity. On the contrary, most of the communities have shown traditional American resourcefulness in efforts to achieve local economic rehabilitation. Local chambers of commerce and regional area redevelopment groups are in existence in practically all of the communities and have been working steadily for the past several years to solve their problems through local subscription, community development drives, and by the use of many other devices to raise funds. These efforts have not been adequate. Created revolving funds are now fully used and dry for any additional capital calls. Investment institutions do not want to pour new capital into decaying communities. It was further made clear by the witnesses representing the distressed areas that the keynote to the eventual success of their efforts is reliance upon self-help. The conclusion is clear that these local communities are virtually powerless to reach a full solution of their problems without some type of outside economic assistance.

The opportunity which this bill places before the Senate is to make available the resources of the Federal Government to help private enterprise to cure these pockets of unemployment and underemployment by the only real remedy, which is by production and employment and the making of a contribution of goods and services to the people of our Nation.

Thus far, I have been speaking primarily of the decaying industrial areas of the country but the needs of the low-income rural areas are no less urgent. Many rural communities in the United States have an average per capita income of as little as one-fourth of the average for the country as a whole. The economic problems of the low-income rural areas are of no less significance than those of the industrial areas with surplus manpower. Available data indicate that some rural areas have not shared during recent decades in the growth of the country as a whole. There are many rural counties in the United States where the average per capita income is as little as one-fourth that of the average person in the United States. A Joint Economic Report states that in terms of constant dollars, there has been no appreciable change between 1948 and 1954 in the number of farm families with income of less than $1,000 per year. The 1954 Census of Agriculture—the most recent—discloses that there are 458 counties in the United States in which a third or more of the commercial farms in those counties sold products valued at only between $250 and $1,200. There were also 500 counties where 35 percent or more of the commercial farms sold products valued between $1,200 and $2,500. It is expected that the counties set forth below would be among those which would receive primary consideration for rehabilitation under the Federal rural redevelopment program which is proposed.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I ask unanimous consent that the statistics from the 1954 Census of Agriculture be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Source: Special tabulation by U.S. Bureau of the Census.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The tables show 450 counties in which more than a third of the farmers sold products which had a gross value of less than $1,200, and 500 counties in which a large percentage of the farmers had gross incomes of between $1,200 and $2,500.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Under the terms of the Senator's bill would all these counties be eligible to apply for aid?

Mr. DOUGLAS. They would be eligible to apply for aid; that is correct.

Mr. CLARK. I am interested to note that there are four Pennsylvania counties in the Senator's list.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct; and there are five Illinois counties, too.

The problem of underemployment in the rural areas has been the subject of intensive study by Government departments and by the Joint Economic Committee. It seems evident that a number of programs would help the low-income farm families, of which the following are especially important:

First. Expanded private and Government credit for low-income farm families.

Second. Extension-type education for farm families and farmers who work off the farm part time.

Third. Encouragement by Federal, State, and local agencies for development of industry in rural areas.

Fourth. Research to fit farm units to changing conditions. Federal-State research to determine needs for aid and for off-farm employment.

Fifth. More training and educational opportunities for farm youth in both agricultural and nonagricultural skills.

Sixth. Better health services and practices.

Seventh. More information to underemployed farmers of job opportunities in urban areas.

Eighth. An increased use of trade area and community improvement programs to raise the standard of living.

Ninth. A broader participation by farmers in the social-security program.

I would like to emphasize the great need for the expansion of job opportunities in nonagricultural pursuits. Any program of this type should be on a self-help basis. The bill I introduce meets that test.

Mr. President, I shall now present an analysis of the bill.

WHAT THE BILL DOES—SECTION 1

The short title of the act is the Area Economic Redevelopment Act.

SECTION 2. FINDING OF FACTS

The purpose of the act is to help areas neding redevelopment to expand their economic activities so as to alleviate substantial unemployment and underemployment that prevails within such areas. This would be accomplished by assisting communities, industries, enterprises, and individuals in providing new employment opportunities and by expanding existing facilities and resources without reducing employment in other areas of the United States.

SECTION 3. AREA REDEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

An Area Redevelopment Administration would be established under the direction and control of an Administrator who is to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The salary of the Administrator is to be $20,000 a year.

SECTION 4. ADVISORY COMMITTEES

The bill provides for the establishment of two advisory committees. Subsection (a) creates a Government Advisory Committee on Area Redevelopment. In addition to the Administrator, 11 heads of Federal departments or Federal independent agencies are designated as members of this committee. The committee is required to meet twice annually and is to make recommendations to the Administrator with regard to carrying out his duties.

Subsection (b) creates a National Public Advisory Committee to be appointed by the Administrator to consist of 12 members representing labor, management, agriculture, and the public in general. This committee is to make recommendations to the Administrator in carrying out his duties.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Administrator to call ad hoc industry committees representing the parties in interest when employment has dropped substantially over a number of years in such industry resulting in high levels of unemployment in various areas designated by the Administrator as redevelopment areas. The industry committees are to recommend plans and programs to the Administrator with reference to such industry.

SECTION 5. REDEVELOPMENT AREAS

The bill recognizes two types of redevelopment areas—industrial and rural—which will be eligible to receive Federal assistance under the bill.

Under subsection (a) an area may be designated an industrial redevelopment area in either of the following two ways: First, the Administrator may, at his discretion, determine that a given area has been subject to substantial and persistent unemployment for an extended period of time and designate the area an industrial redevelopment area; or second, an industrial area must be classified an industrial redevelopment area if it meets any one of the following four tests: (a) not less than 12 percent of the total labor force in the area has been unemployed for a period of 12 months immediately preceding the date on which an application for assistance is made; (b) not less than 9 percent of the labor force in the area has been unemployed for a period of 15 months out of the last 18 months prior to such date; or (c) not less than 6 percent of the labor force was unemployed during at least 18 months in the 2 years immediately preceding such date; or (d) not less than 15 percent of the labor force in the area has been unemployed for a period of 6 months immediately preceding such date.

Subsection (b) sets forth the criteria for designating a rural area as a rural redevelopment area. The Administrator is directed to designate as rural redevelopment areas those rural areas in which he determines that there exists the largest number and percentage of low-income farm families and a condition of substantial and persistent underemployment. In making these designations, the Administrator is required to consider, among other relevant factors, the number of low-income farm families in the various rural areas in the United States, the proportion such low-income families are to the total farm families of each of such areas, the relationship of the income levels of farm families of each such area to the general levels of income in the same area, the current and prospective employment opportunities in each such area, and the availability of farm manpower in each such area for supplemental employment.

Subsection (c) provides that in making determinations concerning redevelopment areas the Administrator is to be guided—but not conclusively governed—by the available information published by the various Federal agencies, State and local governments, universities, and private organizations.

Under subsection (d) the Administrator may also request from the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Director of the Bureau of the Census special studies and such information and data as he deems necessary to enable him to make the determinations provided for in this section. The Administrator is required to reimburse these agencies for expenditures which they incur in connection with filling his requests.

Subsection (e) defines the term "redevelopment area" to mean any area within the United States which has been designated by the Administrator as an industrial redevelopment or a rural redevelopment area.

SECTION 6. LOANS FOR INDUSTRIAL AND RURAL PROJECTS

Section 6 of the bill provides two $100 million revolving funds, one for industrial projects in industrial redevelopment areas, the other for industrial projects in rural redevelopment areas. These revolving funds for loans were provided because witness after witness testified that in these urban and rural areas where unemployment and underemployment have been substantial and persistent the communities' own resources are not sufficient to make it possible for industrial development to proceed. These loans are intended to help provide for plant, equipment, and machinery, but not for working capital or the purchase of raw material and payment of labor. These loans are to be for no longer than 30 years. This is a change from the bill of last year, which provided 40 years as the maximum length. Government participation is never to exceed 65 percent, but may be less. Local and State authorities must put up at least 10 percent, and at least 5 percent must be from non-Government sources.

Section 6 also expressly provides that loans made under it for industrial projects must not be granted to assist establishments relocating from one area to another when such assistance will result in substantial detriment to the area of original location by increasing unemployment. This provision reflects the declaration of purpose of the act, to create new employment opportunities by developing and expanding facilities and resources without substantially reducing employment in other areas of the United States.

SECTION 7. LOANS FOR PUBLIC FACILITIES

The bill provides a revolving fund of $100 million for loans to States, Indian tribes, or organizations representing redevelopment areas to help in financing the purchase or development of land for public facility usage, and construction or alteration of public facilities, if the project will tend to improve the opportunities in the area for the establishment or expansion of industrial or commercial plants or facilities. These loans may run for a period up to 40 years.

A depressed area may have many of the assets sought by industry—buildings, labor, community facilities, and the like—but it may lack one public facility without which all the others are useless, for example, adequate water for industrial use, adequate sewage facilities, or access to a navigable river or a railroad. Industrial parks, also, are sometimes necessary in order to protect industry. The bill provides for the possibility of $100 million of loans to local governments for the provision of these facilities.

INTEREST RATES

The bill authorizes the Administrator to borrow from the Treasury up to $300 million for these revolving funds for the loan programs. The Administrator is to pay interest on these loans borrowed from the Treasury at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, but—

Such rate shall not be greater than the current average yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations.

Loans made to industrial projects or for public facilities must then pay interest to the Treasury at this same rate plus one-half of 1 percent. Of this, one-quarter of 1 percent is allocated to a sinking fund for payment of losses. The markup in the case of public facility loans is to be only one-quarter of 1 percent.

SECTION 8. GRANTS FOR PUBLIC FACILITIES

The bill authorizes appropriations of $75 million, in addition to $300 million of loans to be put on the revolving fund basis, for grants to States or their subdivisions, Indian tribes, or public or private organizations representing redevelopment areas for land acquisition or development for public facilities usage, or construction or alteration of public facilities in the area, if the project will improve the opportunities in the area for the establishment or expansion of industrial or commercial plants or facilities.

This is not an annual appropriation, but a lump sum appropriation.

Some redevelopment areas have inadequate economic resources, either because of chronic unemployment or underemployment or a generally low level of economic development, to borrow money to develop public facilities which would make the areas attractive to new industry. For this reason, the bill provides for grants to improve public facilities.

In other words, according to the testimony, the communities are so flat on their backs that they cannot even finance a loan; or perhaps they can finance a part of the loan, but not all of the loan. In those cases, an outright grant is provided to help the localities bear the burden.

SECTION 9. FUNDS FOR LOANS

This section would authorize the Administrator to obtain funds for making loans under sections 6 and 7 of the bill by borrowing from the Treasury in amounts not exceeding $300 million outstanding at any one time. The interest rate on the notes and obligations representing this borrowing would be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury at a rate not greater than the current average yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations. The amounts thus obtained from the Treasury would be used to establish the revolving funds provided for in sections 6 and 7 of the bill.

SECTIONS 10 AND 11. INFORMATION AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The Administrator is directed to provide assistance, technical information, market research, and other forms of advice available from the Federal Government which would be useful in alleviating unemployment and underemployment in the areas. In addition, the Administrator is authorized to provide technical assistance to the areas including studies evaluating the needs of and developing potentials for economic growth for such areas. This may be done either through the Administrator's staff or by employing individuals, firms, or institutions. Appropriations up to $4.5 million annually are authorized for this program.

SECTION 12. POWERS OF ADMINISTRATOR

The usual corporate powers are provided.

SECTION 13. TERMINATION OF ELIGIBILITY

When unemployment ceases to meet the criteria set forth, the area is no longer eligible. Contracts, however, continue in force.

SECTIONS 14 AND 15. URBAN RENEWAL

The bill makes available to economically depressed areas the benefits of the Federal urban renewal program. Under this section, urban renewal assistance may be provided to a municipally designated as an industrial redevelopment area if there is a reasonable probability that with such assistance the area will be able to achieve more than a temporary improvement in its economic development. Such an area need not comply with the predominantly residential test and thus areas which are predominantly commercial or industrial and which will be redeveloped as commercial or industrial areas are eligible.

SECTIONS 16 AND 17. VOCATIONAL TRAINING AND SUBSISTENCE RETRAINING PAYMENTS

The bill provides that the Secretary of Labor shall determine the needs of the area for vocational training to meet the employment opportunities created by the bill and shall cooperate with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and existing State and local agencies to make these services available to the area.

In order to enable unemployed persons to get the benefits of this training, the bill also provides that the Secretary of Labor may make weekly retraining payments through State agencies to unemployed persons in the redevelopment areas for 13 weeks at the average weekly unemployment compensation rate in that State, but limited to those not receiving unemployment compensation. A ceiling of $10 million a year is placed upon this program.

The question arises as to whether the type of aid to distressed areas contemplated by this bill will serve to create inflationary pressure, or whether it will contribute to economic expansion with price level stability. The purpose of this bill is to provide employment opportunities for idle workers and idle resources and to increase the productivity of resources which now are ineffectively used in areas of chronic and substantial unemployment. The result will be an increase in output. The money spent for this purpose, therefore, will represent an investment in increasing productivity. Dollars spent to promote production by otherwise idle or inefficiently employed resources are not inflationary. Indeed, by making possible an increase in productivity in the Nation's distressed areas, the loans by the Federal Government contemplated under this proposed legislation would, in fact, be anti-inflationary. Moreover, the successful implementing of the bill would serve to reduce public outlays for unemployment compensation, relief, and various other forms of public assistance—payments for which no current production is received in turn. To provide the conditions under which these distressed areas can contribute to increasing the national output, rather than be a drain upon production from other more fortunately situated parts of the country, therefore, represents an important contribution toward enhancing the Nation's economic growth without inflationary pressure.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am delighted to have heard the exposition by the Senator from Illinois of the fact that there is nothing inflationary about this bill.

The Senator from Illinois is one of the most distinguished economists in the country, and certainly the most distinguished economist in the Senate; and I hope all our colleagues will listen to what he has to say on this subject.

As an amateur in the field of economics, it has seemed to me to be almost economic illiteracy to suggest that putting people back to work at a time when the economy is slack, and when the need is to get greater production, would amount to inflation. Such an argument does not make any sense to me at all. I wonder whether my good friend, the Senator from Illinois, would agree.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do agree. What those who say such a measure would be inflationary rely upon is the fact that total Government expenditures initially might seem to be increased, and, therefore, they say, there will be more Government borrowings; and if the budget does not balance, there will be more money chasing goods, and therefore the price level will rise. But they do not take into account, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has pointed out, the fact that this additional monetary purchasing power will put otherwise idle labor to work, with otherwise idle capital resources, producing goods which otherwise would not be produced; and, therefore, there will be an offsetting, by goods, of that money; and, therefore, the amount of taxes the Federal Government would collect would be increased; and while perhaps we cannot work out any precise ratio, the Federal Government itself may ultimately get back all it spends, and, indeed, will, because I wish to emphasize again that the $300 million we are proposing is in the form of loans, not grants; only $75 million additional would be in the form of grants. This is a business transaction to help localities and firms which cannot command private capital, to get "seed" capital, so to speak, with which they can start, and to which they should add sums of money of their own, so that the total investment ought to be a number of times the amount of the public loan.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator from Illinois think that the failure of the Federal budget to distinguish between loans and grants—between moneys which are loans and will be repaid, and moneys which, once spent, will be gone—is in many ways deceiving the American people with respect to the real impact of the budget and of our Federal fiscal operations?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I quite agree; I think we should draw a distinction between the so-called ordinary budget and the capital budget.

As a matter of fact, in one of the appendixes to the existing budget—it is tucked away in the back of that huge book—there is an analysis like this one of the capital investments of the Federal Government—which, as I recall, come to some billion dollars.

Mr. CLARK. It is quite interesting that that table is not referred to when charges are made that the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and others are wild-eyed spenders who want to unbalance the Federal budget.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a further question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Will not those who seek to charge that the bill is inflationary use as part of their argument that even though most of its provisions are for loans, not grants, nevertheless, in the light of our obsolete budget procedures the bill would tend to unbalance the President's budget? Will not that argument be made?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It may be made, but in that connection I would say that in the Federal budget there are sources of waste which, in my judgment, we should stop. I think there is tremendous waste in the Department of Defense—for instance, in the huge surpluses scattered over the country and over the world. In a few days, if time permits, I intend to discuss that subject. In brief, they have $44 billion worth of equipment and supplies scattered over the world, but only need, as a maximum, $27 billion worth for peacetime and wartime reserves. Furthermore, of the approximately $5 billion of contracts they let, according to the House Committee on Government Operations, only about 5 percent are subject to competitive bidding; the rest are negotiated contracts, with all the waste they bring about.

Furthermore, there is tremendous waste in the farm program.

In addition, there is tremendous waste in the bureaucracy here in Washington.

If the administration would permit the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Illinois to work on that budget, we would sweat out the waste, and would have remaining enough money for welfare, adequate defense, and the building up of the depressed areas.

Mr. CLARK. Even if we were unsuccessful in our effort—like Hercules—to clean out a little bit of the Augean stables, does not the Senator from Illinois agree with me that it would be quite possible to balance the budget without making any increase in tax rates, if the proposals of the Senator from Illinois, in which I had the pleasure of joining last year, namely, to close tax loopholes, were adopted?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that would not only balance the budget, but also would produce a surplus.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Or it would reduce the national debt, if that seemed wise at this time. However, today many of our people of very equal incomes pay very unequal amounts of taxes.

Mr. CLARK. It is my understanding that the Senator from Illinois has a bill to close those tax loopholes. I should like to have an opportunity to join, at an early date, in the sponsorship of that bill, here on the floor of the Senate.

At this time I wish to repeat, as I have said many times before, that I believe the budget should be balanced this year, even under our obsolete budget procedures. I believe it can be balanced this year by the elimination of waste and by the closing of tax loopholes. I should like to have it very clear, indeed, that when I advocate spending money, I also advocate raising revenues sufficiently to balance the budget at a time when, in the midst of prosperity, enormous unemployment still exists in this country.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding to me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his statement.

Mr. President, modifications in Senate bill 3683 which was passed originally by the Senate in the 85th Congress are as follows:

(a) An independent administration is created to provide an authority to carry out this diversified program—section 3.

(b) An agriculture representative is added to the Public Advisory Board, so that the problems of agricultural areas may be brought more squarely into a careful administration—section 4c.

(c) The 300-county limitation on participating rural areas is removed—section 5b.

(d) The loan period for industrial and rural loans is reduced from 40 to 30 years—section 6a(6).

(e) Criteria requiring that funds provided in the bill be used to provide more than temporary alleviation of unemployment or underemployment—section 6a(3).

(f) The interest rate to the borrower is increased to one-half of 1 percent, with the additional one-quarter of 1 percent being specifically allocated to a sinking fund to cover possible losses incurred—section 6b(8).

(g) Authorization for grants for public facilities is limited to 1 year, rather than for an indeterminate period—section 8d.

(h) Vocational training provisions are tied to the employment opportunities created in the area, as are subsistence retraining benefits, with a $10 million ceiling established for retraining benefits—sections 16a, 16b, 17a.

The revisions made in the present bill are the result of information and study during hearings in the House and the Senate of the 85th Congress. I believe that these revisions provide a better bill.

I believe the passage of this measure by Congress and its wise and careful administration will bring a new day of hope and opportunity to many areas and to literally millions of our people who want nothing more than a chance to work. Mr. President, this kind of a program is designed to stimulate private employment.

The bill proposes no easy handout. It holds out the prospect of work, of new jobs, of increased production, of expanding business and commerce, of more healthy community life, and, above all, of fuller utilization and development of the most precious resource—our Nation's human resources. It is a domestic point IV program which we badly need. Why should we help so lavishly the distressed areas abroad, and yet deny help to our own kith and kin?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a comparison of the area redevelopment bills be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Denotes revisions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask that the bill lie on the desk for 2 days so that if other Senators wish to join the 39 Senators who are now cosponsors, they may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will lie on the desk as requested.

During the delivery of Mr. DOUGLAS' speech:

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask unanimous consent that my remarks be placed at the end of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER. I had expected to comment at some length upon the bill which the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois has introduced. However, I must go to my home State in a few minutes. Before doing so I wish to thank the Senator for giving me the opportunity to speak about his bill. I commend the distinguished Senator from Illinois for introducing the bill. However, beyond that, I wish to commend him for his long and indefatigable labors to secure the passage of legislation which would give hope to the areas throughout the country which suffer from persistent unemployment and underemployment. I am glad that he has asked me to join as a cosponsor of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Kentucky is the first cosponsor.

Mr. COOPER. I thank the Senator very much. I expect to help the Senator in every way I can. There is no question about the need for such legislation. The years of work which the Senator from Illinois has devoted to this kind of legislation, and the hearings that have been held, prove that fact. Moreover, the supporting facts prove it. The President of the United States, in several messages to Congress, has stated that legislation of this type is necessary. The only issue is with respect to the means by which the problem should be attacked.

I may say that I do not support this bill merely because of the situation which exists in Kentucky, but because it is a fact that what occurs in my State is typical of what occurs throughout the United States.

From my study of the bill which the Senator from Illinois has introduced, and from my experience in my own State of Kentucky, and my knowledge of conditions there, I have come to the conclusion that the bill which the Senator from Illinois is introducing is a reasonable approach to the solution of this very difficult problem.

I know from my own experience something about the fiscal condition of local areas. Many towns and cities in the depressed areas do not have the means to supply large amounts of aid or to contribute a large percentage of funds to the various types of investment projects which could be established in the depressed areas. I think the percentage which the Senator from Illinois has provided is a reasonable percentage for the Federal Government to contribute.

I said the other day, and I repeat it, that in an economy in which parts of our Nation are surging ahead, where there is large employment and where there is an increase in wealth on the part of many of the people, I do not think it is right to allow thousands of others to be left behind, lying in the ditch, so to speak. We cannot forget such areas. We cannot forget those people. In my State of Kentucky 250,000 people are receiving surplus food. There are nine areas in Kentucky—which includes 25 percent of our population—which have been designated "labor surplus areas" by the Federal Government. The situation is critical and immediate attention is called for. I have introduced two bills toward meeting the immediate need for more food and work and shall introduce additional legislation in the near future. But the long-range problems of our areas in Kentucky is that industrial development must be stimulated, encouraged, and aided by legislation such as the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois has introduced today.

I again thank the Senator from Illinois for the opportunity to be a cosponsor. I intend to contribute whatever I can to the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky, not merely for his comments, but also for the constant interest which he has shown in this problem and his very intelligent efforts to improve the situation. I think his remarks underscore my statement that this is a bipartisan bill.

The Senator from Kentucky is the first cosponsor. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] is the second cosponsor. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] is the third cosponsor. I shall make the request, after I have finished my statement and the bill has been introduced, that the bill may lie at the desk for 2 days, so that any other Senators who may wish to become cosponsors of the bill may have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with the splendid address just made by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois with respect to the area economic development bill, which he and I and 37 other cosponsors have just sent to the desk.

This bill its patterned after the Douglas-Payne bill of last year, which was passed by Congress, but vetoed by President Eisenhower. The bill of last year was a bipartisan compromise bill. Again this year we have a bipartisan bill.

I should like to spend a moment or two discussing the impact of this bill on my own State, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. There are 17 counties in Pennsylvania which would be immediately eligible to share in Federal assistance; namely, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Schuylkill, Columbia, Montour, Northumberland, Union, Snyder, Juniata, Mifflin, Clinton, Clearfield, Blair, Cambria, Somerset, Fayette, and Erie.

These are the areas already classified by the Government as areas of substantial labor surplus. However, the bill is drawn so that smaller counties which have never been classified at all, or parts of larger metropolitan areas, may be subsequently included. In the latter categories might come parts of our great metropolitan communities which center around Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

The unemployment rate in the 17 counties I mentioned ranges from 10.3 percent in the Northumberland-Snyder-Union-Montour area to 23.7 percent in Fayette County.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point a table which shows, for 12 Pennsylvania labor market areas, the latest unemployment figures, based upon unemployment as a percentage of the labor force, and unemployment in excess of 6 percent. These 12 labor market areas, which are identified by their principal cities, include the 17 counties I named earlier.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Labor market area	Unemployment [1]	Unemployment as percent of labor force	Unemployment in excess of 6 percent
Altoona	8,900	16.6	5,700
Erie	14,000	14.1	8,000
Johnstown	16,700	16.8	10,700
Scranton	16,000	15.6	9,800
Wilkes-Barre-Hazleton	21,700	15.9	13,500
Berwick-Bloomsburg	2,700	12.5	1,400
Clearfield-Du Bois	5,000	13.6	2,800
Lewistown	2,500	11.4	1,200
Lock Haven	1,800	11.6	900
Pottsville (Schuylkill County)	12,400	15.8	7,700
Sunbury-Shamokin-Mount Carmel	6,650	10.3	2,800
Uniontown-Connellsville	11,300	23.7	8,300
Total			72,800

[1] First 5 based on November figures; following 7 based on latest available data.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, unemployment has continued at these intolerable levels almost continuously since World War II—despite the heroic efforts of the communities concerned to help themselves, and despite the assistance of the State. It is clear that if we are ever to meet this problem, the Federal Government must undertake a fair share of the total effort.

In my State there is an industrial development authority, headed by our secretary of commerce, which has made very real and helpful efforts to rehabilitate a number of our distressed areas during the past 4 years, when Gov. George M. Leader was our distinguished chief executive.

Those efforts have been successful to the extent that State finances permit, but our capacity to go further is extremely limited. We are at the moment facing the need to raise between $350 million and $400 million in additional taxes in Pennsylvania for the coming biennium. Somewhere in the vicinity of $350 million is required for needed school construction, which cannot be undertaken because no funds are available. We have a State program in aid of urban renewal which is too small to give our cities much help. There has been but a token effort to help in that regard. In short, my Commonwealth is desperately in need of help from the Federal Government in all these categories.

In addition to the industrial counties, there are several Pennsylvania rural counties which might qualify for assistance under the bill of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

May I state for the RECORD, briefly, these figures:

Unemployment compensation claims in Pennsylvania were at an alltime high in the week ending January 9, 1959. Regular claims were 418,000, temporary claims were 77,000, for a total of 495,000 individual unemployment compensation claims.

The December 15 official unemployment figures are 472,000. The number has, of course, risen since that date, and it will rise further during the next month or two—perhaps 3 months—until I fear it will come close to the recession high of 520,000 last spring.

One measure of our difficulty is the reduction of our unemployment compensation fund from $350 million a year ago to $125,300,000 as of December 31.

Mr. President, I could describe community after community, through hard and soft coal areas, along the lines of the Erie, Lackawanna, and Reading, where communities are so impoverished that they do not have money to provide the facilities necessary to create industrial parks to attract industry. Yet those areas are peopled by fine, hard-working American citizens, who ask only an opportunity to be put to work, and who love their homes, and want to remain there.

I hope we have arrived at the point where we shall not repeat what was done to the silver and gold mine towns of the West, when towns were allowed to grow up, and then disintegrate, with all the resulting social problems. These people and their forebears have lived in Pennsylvania for more than 100 years, and some for as long as 200 years. In my judgment, they are entitled to the opportunity to earn their living in the communities of their fathers and grandfathers.

The bill which President Eisenhower has proposed to meet the chronic unemployment problem is little more than an empty gesture. We saw that last year. We know that the situation will be the same this year.

It is no exaggeration to say that the amount of money recommended by the President, approximately $50 million, could well be utilized in its entirety by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Only $10 million is to be disbursed in the coming fiscal year.

There is no provision for loans or grants for public facilities.

The interest rate is too high to provide the incentive that is needed.

The assignment of administrative responsibility to the Secretary of Commerce in the administration bill would turn the program over to a Department which has shown a complete lack of sympathy.

In my judgment it would do as much to kill the program before it got off the ground as the Urban Renewal Administration and the Public Housing Administration are doing today to kill public housing and urban renewal, by choking the programs through administrative regulations.

Three concessions have been made in the bill to meet the criticisms contained in the President's veto statement. I hope those concessions will be enough to persuade the President that he should sign the bill this time.

First, the maximum term of the loans is to be reduced from 40 years to 30 years. Second, the language relating to administration of the grants has been revised to meet the President's allegation that the previous language was loosely drawn. Third, the agency is to be authorized to borrow directly from the Treasury for its loan funds, thus meeting the President's argument that last year's bill contained no funds.

I have received resolutions from the City Council of the City of Wilkes-Barre and the City Council of the City of Scranton, two centers of our great northeastern Pennsylvania anthracite area—and once among the most prosperous cities of our Commonwealth—urging the Senate to pass as soon as possible the bill which was introduced today by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those two resolutions be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION REQUESTING FAVORABLE ACTION ON PROPOSED LEGISLATION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN AREA REDEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Whereas in the last session of the Congress of the United States of America, the House Committee on Banking and Currency recommended the passage of a certain bill entitled "A bill to establish an effective program to alleviate conditions of substantial and persistent unemployment and underemployment in certain economically depressed areas"; and

Whereas the proposed legislation was never enacted into law; and

Whereas the 86th Congress will convene on January 7, 1959; and

Whereas the city of Wilkes-Barre has been classified for some time as a depressed economic area; and

Whereas the favorable adoption of a program of area redevelopment would play an integral part in relieving unemployment and promote industrial development, urban redevelopment and renewal and provide for a healthier economy with full employment; and

Whereas the city officials of the city of Wilkes-Barre desire to respectfully recommend favorable action on a new bill for area redevelopment in the next session of Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of the City of Wilkes-Barre, and it is hereby resolved by the authority of the same, That the city officials of the city of Wilkes-Barre are in favor of an effective area redevelopment bill to provide for a program to help Wilkes-Barre and other communities to fully develop new industries, to aid in urban renewal and redevelopment programs and provide for such other benefits which would promote a sound economy and greater employment to the citizens of this important Wyoming Valley area; it is further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be brought to the attention of the 86th Congress and further that the city clerk is hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower; the Honorable Secretary of Labor, James Mitchell; Secretary of Commerce, Lewis L. Strauss; U.S. Senators Joseph Clark and Hugh Scott; and Congressman Daniel J. Flood.

RESOLUTION OF THE DIRE NEED FOR EARLY ADOPTION OF THE AREA REDEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Whereas news reports show that new local groups of workers will be forced to join our heavy idle rolls and this new absence of earned income will further burden our economy, all this at Christmastide and in a so-called period of rising national employment; and

Whereas Mayor Hanlon and this council have experienced a searching deliberation in order to properly balance municipal economy at this time; and

Whereas Scranton and this area have already amply demonstrated maximum private and community response to bring full employment: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Scranton City Council, That this strong message be laid before the 86th Congress, due to convene January 7, that early introduction and passage of the proposed area redevelopment bill be accomplished, since it provides an effective program to assist Scranton and other communities in the fields of industrial development, community development, and urban renewal, public works, and provide for other benefits that can be assembled as a common Federal, State, and local effort to bring about a sound local economy and full employment; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be communicated to our new Congressman, STANLEY PROKOP, and to our Senator, JOSEPH S. CLARK, and our new Senator-elect, HUGH SCOTT, and to all other members of Pennsylvania's 86th delegation to the Congress, to the Honorable Secretary of Commerce, Lewis Strauss, the Honorable Secretary of Labor, James Mitchell, and, most appropriately, to the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower.

JEROME E. PARKER,
President, City Council.
JAMES T. HANLON,
Mayor.
SAM DRUCK,
City Clerk.

DECEMBER 17, 1958.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in connection with the tragic unemployment situation which continues throughout the country in general, and particularly in the States of Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, I should like to evidence my strong support for the bill, S. 489, introduced by the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], of which I am happy to be a cosponsor, which bill provides for an emergency stepup of the Federal Government's program of surplus food distribution to needy families.

The bill directs the Secretary of Agriculture to spend $50 million prior to June 30, 1959, and $100 million in fiscal 1960 to purchase additional food to supplement the food currently made available to the needy in Pennsylvania and elsewhere throughout the Nation. The money would come from funds already accumulated under section 32 of the law of August 24, 1935, and no new funds would be involved.

A stepup in the surplus food distribution program is an absolute necessity in Pennsylvania and other areas hard hit by continuing unemployment. In Pennsylvania there are 916,000 persons in 59 of the 67 counties in the State who have been certified as entitled to receive surplus food because they lack the means to buy food on the open market. In Philadelphia County 7 percent of the entire population is receiving this type of assistance; in Allegheny County 10 percent; Luzerne County 14 percent; in Blair and Cambria Counties one out of every three persons receives food under the Federal program.

I point out that the tragic floods which inundated both the Susquehanna and Lackawanna River Valleys during the past few days have so flooded the coal mines in much of the anthracite area, particularly Luzerne and Lackawanna Counties, that I am fearful that most, if not all, of the mines in those areas will have to be closed for an indefinite period of time. This will swell the ranks of the unemployed. It will make even more necessary the surplus food program, and will make essential the passage of the area redevelopment bill, about which I have been speaking today.

At the moment, Mr. President, the type of food that is being distributed is entirely inadequate for human needs. With all of our bulging warehouses of Government foods, we are distributing only five staple items at present: Wheat (at the rate of 4 pounds per person per month) and corn meal, rice, dried milk, and butter (at the rate of 1 pound per person per month).

State welfare agencies which distribute surplus foods say they have been informed by Federal authorities that cheese, which they had been receiving until December, will no longer be supplied. Meat products, beans, fruit, eggs and cooking oil have not been supplied for many months.

Passage of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] would insure something better than a bare subsistence diet for the many thousands of men, women, and children who are forced by circumstances frequently beyond their control to depend on the food they receive under the Federal surplus food program to keep alive.

Mr. President, I have been one of those who have consistently voted in favor of our foreign aid programs. Personally, I do not think the programs have provided quite enough. I intend to vote for the aid program again this year. I am heartily in sympathy with Public Law 480, which makes surplus agricultural commodities available for use by the needy and hungry abroad. I think the least we can do is to extend to the people of our country the same generosity extended to those in need of help overseas.

I hope the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] will receive early and favorable consideration, and will shortly be passed by the Congress.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I submit an order for immediate consideration. The order has been cleared with the acting majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] be released from further service on the Committee on the Judiciary; that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] be released from further service on the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences and on the Committee on Rules and Administration; and that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] be released from further service to the Committee on Banking and Currency and on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

And be it further ordered, that the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] be assigned to service on the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs; that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] be assigned to service on the Committee on Banking and Currency; and that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] be assigned to service on the Committee on the Judiciary and on the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a list of the assignments, on the minority side, on various committees.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative GEORGE H. CHRISTOPHER, I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 28 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Wednesday, January 28, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Psalms 19:14: Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer.

O Thou who art the counselor of our minds and the companion of our souls, we rejoice that daily we may bring our aspirations and desires, our longings and hopes to Thy listening ear and understanding heart.

We pray that we may know Thee more intimately and surrender ourselves unto Thee more completely for Thou art our light in darkness and our strength in times of weakness.

Show us how we may be helpful in releasing the hidden splendor of humanity and in bringing unto all mankind the blessings of the more abundant life.

To Thy name we ascribe all the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF HOUSE MEMBER OF NATIONAL HISTORICAL PUBLICATIONS COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the provisions of section 6, Public Law 754, 81st Congress, the Chair appoints as a member of the National Historical Publications Commission the gentleman from California, Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER.

APPOINTMENT OF HOUSE MEMBER OF THE BOSTON NATIONAL HISTORIC SITES COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the provisions of section 2, Public Law 75, 84th Congress, as amended, the Chair appoints as a member of the Boston National Historic Sites Commission the following member on the part of the House: Mr. O'NEILL, of Massachusetts.

STUDIES BY COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 27, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct studies and investigations relating to certain matters within its jurisdiction, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct full and complete investigations and studies relating to the following matters coming within the jurisdiction of the committee, namely—

(1) relating to the administration and operation of general immigration and nationality laws and the resettlement of refugees, including such activities of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration which affect immigration in the United States; or involving violation of the immigration laws of the United States through abuse of private relief legislation;

(2) involving claims, both public and private, against the United States;

(3) involving the operation and administration of national penal institutions, including personnel and inmates therein;

(4) relating to judicial proceedings and the administration of Federal courts and personnel thereof, including local courts in Territories and possessions;

(5) relating to the operation and administration of the antitrust laws, including the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act; and

(6) involving the operation and administration of Federal statutes, rules, and regulations relating to crime and criminal procedure; and

(7) involving the operation and administration of the Submerged Lands Act and the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act:

Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House.

The committee shall report to the House (or the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within or without the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "That" insert ", effective from January 3, 1959."

Page 2, line 20, change the colon to a period.

Page 2, line 20, make a new paragraph of the sentence beginning "Provided".

Page 3, strike out the following language in lines 6 and 7: "or without", "is in session."

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Referring to the provision that gives the Committee on the Judiciary authority to investigate submerged lands, is that new or has it been included in previous resolutions?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have here five resolutions relating to standing committees giving them authority and power to investigate matters over which they have jurisdiction. All of these resolutions, including the one about which the gentleman has inquired, have been altered to conform with resolutions which were passed by the House last year, so that there are no innovations in any of these resolutions, so far as I know. They conform to the usual power that is given to committees to investigate matters within their jurisdiction.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on Rules and the minority supports the resolution. I have no requests for time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE TO CONDUCT INVESTIGATIONS AND STUDIES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 56 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That effective from January 4, 1959, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce may make investigations and studies into matters within its jurisdiction, including the following:

(1) Policies with respect to competition among the various modes of transportation, whether rail, air, motor, water, or pipeline; measures for increased safety; and adequacy of the national transportation system for defense and the needs of an expanding economy;

(2) Policies with respect to the promotion of the development of civil aviation; measures for increased safety; restrictions on American air carriers which impede the free flow of commerce; routes, rates, accounts, and subsidy payments; airport construction, hazards of adjacency to airports, and condemnation of airspace; aircraft and airline liability; aircraft research and development and market for American aircraft; and air navigational aids and traffic control;

(3) Allocation of radio spectrum; color television; pay television; educational television; ownership and control of radio and television stations; technical developments in the communications field;

(4) Adequacy of the protection to investors afforded by the disclosure and regulatory provisions of the various Securities Acts;

(5) Adequacy of petroleum, natural gas, and electric energy resources for defense and the needs of an expanding economy; adequacy, promotion, regulation, and safety of the facilities for extraction or generation, transmission and distribution of such resources; development of synthetic liquid fuel processes; and regulation of security issues of and control of natural gas pipeline companies;

(6) Advertising, fair competition, and labeling;

(7) Research in weather, including air pollution and smog, and artificially induced weather;

(8) Effects of inflation upon benefits provided under railroad retirement and railroad unemployment programs; and inequities in provisions of statutes relating thereto, with comparison of benefits under the social security system;

(9) Adequacy of medical facilities, medical personnel, and medical teaching and training facilities; research into human diseases; provisions for medical care; efficient and effective quarantine; protection to users against incorrectly labeled and deleterious foods, drugs, cosmetics, and devices; and other matters relating to public health;

(10) Disposition of funds arising from the operation of the Trading With the Enemy Act;

(11) Current and prospective consumption of newsprint and other papers used in the printing of newspapers, magazines, or such other publications as are admitted to second-class mailing privileges; current and prospective production and supply of such papers, factors affecting such supply, and possibilities of additional production through the use of alternative source materials;

(12) Increase in traffic accidents on the streets and highways of the United States during recent years; factors responsible for such increase, the resulting deaths, personal injuries, and economic losses; and measures for eliminating such accidents or reducing their frequency and severity; and

(13) The administration and enforcement by departments and agencies of the Government of provisions of law relating to subjects which are within the jurisdiction of such committee.

For the purposes of such investigations and studies the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within or outside the United States, whether the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

The committee may report to the House at any time during the present Congress the results of any investigation or study made under authority of this resolution, together with such recommendations as it deems appropriate. Any such report shall be filed with the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session.

With the following committee amendments:

Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Page 4, line 6, strike out "or outside."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, like the preceding one, conforms to the resolution passed last year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the minority members of the Rules Committee agree to this resolution. I have no requests for time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY TO CONDUCT STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS, AND TO MAKE INQUIRIES RELATING TO HOUSING

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 81 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 4, 1959, the Committee on Banking and Currency, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct full and complete studies and investigations and make inquiries with respect to any matter or matters in the field of housing coming within the jurisdiction of such committee, including, but not limited to, (1) the operation of the various FHA-assisted housing programs, (2) the operation of the Federal National Mortgage Association, (3) the status and adequacy of mortgage credit in the United States, (4) the current rate of construction of residential dwelling units in relation to housing requirements and demands, and the role of Government-assisted mortgage programs with respect thereto, (5) the role of housing construction in the national economy, (6) the operation of the privately financed military housing program, (7) the requirement of and demand for Federal assistance in the development of community facilities, (8) the operation of the slum clearance and urban renewal programs, and (9) farm housing and the adequacy of farm housing credit.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session) as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigations and studies, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution, the committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, including any Territory, Commonwealth, or possession thereof, whether or not the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or by any member designated by such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses.

With the following committee amendments:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Page 2, strike out the following language in lines 17 and 18: "including any Territory, Commonwealth, or possession thereof."

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the minority on the Committee on Rules support this resolution, and I have no requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS TO CONDUCT INVESTIGATIONS AND STUDIES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 101 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 4, 1959, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to conduct a full and complete investigation and study of the following programs of benefits for veterans and their dependents and survivors:

(1) The programs of compensation and pension;

(2) The programs of hospitalization, domiciliary care, medical and dental care and treatment, and furnishing of prosthetic appliances;

(3) The insurance and indemnity programs;

(4) The housing and business loan programs, and the program of furnishing assistance for the acquisition of specially adapted housing;

(5) The programs of education and training (including vocational rehabilitation);

(6) The furnishing of burial allowances; and

(7) The furnishing of unemployment compensation under the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952 and chapter 41 of title 38, United States Code; with a view to determining whether or not such programs are being conducted economically, efficiently, in the best interests of the Government and the beneficiaries of such programs, and in such a manner as to avoid the misuse of Government funds; whether or not such programs adequately serve the needs and protect the welfare of the beneficiaries of such programs; and whether changes in the law or in the administration and operation of the programs either will lead to greater efficiency and economy or will make such programs more adequately serve the needs of the beneficiaries of such programs.

The committee is also authorized to conduct a full and complete investigation and study to determine—

(1) the extent to which appeals for charitable contributions are made to the American people, or segments thereof, in the name of American veterans by appealing to the desire of the American people to assist such veterans and their survivors or dependents;

(2) whether an undue proportion of such charitable contributions is used to meet the expenses of conducting such appeals and for other administrative expenses rather than for providing services for or benefits to veterans;

(3) whether any of such appeals are fraudulent in nature;

(4) whether additional supervision of the fund-raising activities conducted by organizations chartered by Act of Congress in the name of veterans is necessary or desirable; and

(5) the existence of any other abuses connected with charitable appeals made in the name of veterans.

The committee shall report to the House (or to the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session), as soon as practicable during the present Congress, the results of its investigations and studies, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, its Territories, and possessions, the Republic of the Philippines, and elsewhere, whether or not the House has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such records, documents, and papers, to administer oaths, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee, or by any member designated by such chairman, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, after line 15, insert new paragraph as follows:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Page 3, strike out the following language in lines 24 and 25: "its Territories, and possessions, the Republic of the Philippines, and elsewhere,".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS TO CONDUCT STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS AND MAKE INQUIRIES WITH RESPECT TO AERONAUTICAL AND OTHER SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AND OUTER SPACE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 133 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective from January 4, 1959, the Committee on Science and Astronautics, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct full and complete studies and investigations and make inquiries with respect to any matter or matters in or related to the fields of astronautical research and development (including resources, personnel, equipment, and facilities), outer space (including exploration and control thereof, and air and space law), and other scientific research and development (including international scientific cooperation) coming within the jurisdiction of such committee.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee or subcommittee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within or without the United States, including any Territory, Commonwealth, or possession thereof, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member designated by him may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses.

The committee shall report to the House as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its studies, investigations, and inquiries, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable. Any such report which is made when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

With the following committee amendments:

"Provided, That the committee shall not undertake any investigation of any subject which is being investigated by any other committee of the House."

Page 2, strike out the following language in lines 2, 3, and 4: "or without", "including any Territory, Commonwealth, or possession thereof," and "is in session."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is a new committee which I believe you are all familiar with. This is the Committee on Science and Astronautics. It has not been in existence heretofore. The resolution, however, conforms to the usual resolutions giving the committee the power to make investigations within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this resolution as amended has the unanimous support of the minority members of the Committee on Rules, and I have no requests for time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RULES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 138) to amend the Rules of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Rules of the House of Representatives are hereby amended as follows:

In Clause 26(j) of Rule XI, strike out "25" and insert "26" in lieu thereof.

In Clause 2 of Rule XIII, strike out "20" and insert "21" in lieu thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the creation of the Committee on Science and Astronautics it was necessary to make several changes throughout the rules. Inadvertently we failed to change the numbers of certain paragraphs. This resolution merely changes the numbers of paragraphs.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection on this side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 57), as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock antemeridian, on Thursday, February 12, 1959.

That the Committee on Arrangements, created pursuant to Public Law 85–775, is empowered to make suitable arrangements for fitting and proper exercises for the joint session of Congress hereby authorized and, in accordance with provisions of Public Law 85–775 to issue appropriate invitations to officials, dignitaries, and other persons to join in this commemoration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRADE POLICIES

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, the President has repeatedly said in speeches, messages, and the like, that a liberal trade policy and the expansion of foreign trade and investment were essential to free world economic strength and security.

Just recently we have had a visit from the Deputy Premier of Russia promoting the Russian trade offensive. Today the Russian Premier, Mr. Khrushchev, has been talking and bragging again about the Russian trade offensive. However, despite these professed sentiments for more liberal trade, and the Soviet threat, we have seen our Government within the past few days award a contract to a local company against a low bid by a competent contractor which was $300,000 less. This low bidder is located in England, one of our oldest friends.

This is the type of doubledealing in trade policies which unfortunately has characterized much of our whole approach throughout the world.

I quote from an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post last Saturday:

> The time has long since passed when it was realistic to expect this administration to stand up for principle in this area. But in deference to the country's reputation for fair play at least it might end the double standard. If the intention is to wriggle out of foreign trade commitments in the face of political pressures, it would be far less damaging and more honest to say so frankly in advance.

The present administration in Washington is bedeviled by a form of schizophrenia. It pays lip service to high ideals and fine policies, but its actions too often belie its professions. It tries to be all things to all men, and that is a sure-fire formula for schizophrenia.

Nowhere has this been more evident than in our foreign trade policy.

In his state of the Union message a few days ago, the President said:

> There can be no such thing as a fortress America. If ever we were reduced to the isolation implied by that term, we would occupy a prison, not a fortress.

That is a fine sentiment which we all applaud, but how this principle can be weakened when it is put into practice.

Even an economy-minded President might be willing to forgo economy if the national security was involved, although a look at his new budget would raise some questions about that. But was the national security involved? The OCDM made no finding as to national security. It has in the past repeatedly turned down high domestic bids because it found no national security considerations. Moreover, the OCDM is currently engaged in a thorough study of the national security implications of imports for this industry and hasn't as yet arrived at any conclusions on the issue.

No, the national security was not involved. It was only an excuse, not a reason. What was the real reason? The real reason is well known to those of my colleagues who have been reading the press on the subject. As I indicated, this decision was made on January 20, yet the Philadelphia Inquirer for November 1, a few short days before the congressional elections, carried a story to the effect that Senator HUGH SCOTT announced that the Baldwin Co. had been given the turbine order for the Arkansas project. In the words of the Inquirer, "SCOTT said he received word from the White House yesterday morning." In the issue of Time magazine that is out today, Senator SCOTT reaffirms that this is the case.

Now I have no quarrel at all with my former colleague. I think he was motivated by a legitimate interest in wanting to help his constituents.

The blame must be at the White House. Having made a commitment on political grounds as long ago as last November, when they had to carry through on the commitment last week the only excuse that could be given under the terms of President Eisenhower's own Executive order on the Buy American Act, was the excuse of national security—that the national security of the United States would be jeopardized if the contract was given to the low British bidder. Read the President on this very subject in 1955 when he charged ODM with the responsibility of making findings under his "buy American" Executive order. The President said that the national security exception should not be used unless there was "a clear showing that (the exception) is justified by considerations of national security." There was neither a clear showing made in this case nor could there be.

It is no wonder that such policies, or shall I say lack of policies, cause consternation among our friends. The reaction in Britain to this case compares to the reactions in Latin America to some of our vacillating foreign trade policy actions. Even Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton may in the end be the loser. The British have recently liberalized their restrictions on imports from the United States, and we look to expanded sales in their market. Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton has in the past 4 years sold $21 million worth of equipment to the British National Coal Board alone. This turbine contract was worth $1¾ million to Baldwin. In trade policy, as in other things, you cannot have it both ways.

Where was the White House and the State Department throughout all this? They are charged with the constitutional responsibility of conducting and maintaining our foreign relations. Can we believe that the Director of OCDM made this decision on his own initiative? Is national security a matter that can be so lightly treated, particularly when it impinges so directly on our foreign relations and hence on our national security in a most vital sense?

Mr. Speaker, Congress cannot abide such actions. I hope that we will soon have an opportunity to make a full and fair investigation of this incident and of the broader questions of national security as it relates to our foreign economic policy. This is a matter of utmost urgency for our national survival.

ADMINISTRATION OF FARM PROGRAMS

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 3334 to correct what the Honorable H. CARL ANDERSEN and I consider to be a major injustice in the administration of farm programs.

It is painfully clear to anyone familiar with the agricultural situation today, that farmers no longer have the control over their own programs that they once had. They feel that the present system of selecting community and county committeemen has removed them from management of these programs and has subjected them to dictatorial pressures never before experienced.

Farmers have demonstrated that they themselves are the best judges of those who should represent them in the formulation and administration of their programs in a democratic manner. They believe that a program operated by farmers for farmers will insure greater efficiency and better management.

The purpose of our bill is to return the farm program to farmer administration through free elections of community and county committeemen.

Mr. ANDERSEN's bill and mine differ in some minor respects. Both bills, however, have as their common purpose the strengthening of farmer administration to promote continuity and stability in the farmer committee system.

Since this is the first important step in improving our farm program, we are hopeful that the great Committee on Agriculture will give prompt and careful attention to the subject.

A GRAVE THREAT TO FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, often we find that those who are most vocal in denouncing a wrong are themselves guilty of the wrong they denounce. Perhaps they hope that by outshouting all others they can keep the spotlight from focusing upon themselves. Such is a case we discover in our very midst.

Not far from these hallowed walls is another institution which often confuses itself with Congress, the executive offices, and the U.S. Supreme Court. I speak of that giant among giants, that fearless gladiator of the oppressed, that lion in the jungle of the defenseless, that tower of light and strength in times of distress and darkness, that fairminded factory of the four freedoms, the Washington Post and Times Herald, the only morning newspaper in the Nation's Capital.

I know all of these things to be true for almost daily the newspaper itself so advises me, and its other discriminating readers, through its editorial pages.

Recently my constituents in Birmingham, aware of this well of influence, offered to the Washington Post and Times Herald a letter in the form of a paid advertisement, setting forth the views of the South on the problems of integration. The letter had been run as news in many papers and as an advertisement in the New York Times. Can you understand, then, our disbelief and amazement to have this august institution of righteousness, the Washington Post and Times Herald, reject the advertisement without explanation? Here, now, comes the twist.

The Birmingham Post Herald inquired of its brethren, the Washington Post and Times Herald, why the ad was unacceptable. Even though this inquiry was carried all the way to the seat of the imperial publisher himself, not a soul on the Washington Post and Times Herald would answer. The only question presented was "Why?" There was no argument with the paper's decision.

Amazed by this lack of response from the Washington Post and Times Herald, the Birmingham Post-Herald sought help from a gentleman well qualified to assist, J. R. Wiggins, former chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Information of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Mr. Wiggins has been cited numerous times and been given awards for his unending battle against secrecy; primarily secrecy in government but, nevertheless, secrecy. Sadly, Mr. Wiggins was of little help. He advised the reporter to speak with the publisher, something the reporter already had done without obtaining the answer to his question. Mr. Wiggins told the reporter it was a "futile endeavor" to try and get information from himself because he was not going to talk. A strange position, indeed, for a former chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Information, a man whose banner flies so high on the flagpole of sweet reasonableness, a man whose lectures on freedom of information fill many a file, especially his own.

Perhaps Mr. Wiggins' reluctance to talk stems from his position. He is vice president and executive editor of the Washington Post and Times Herald.

How discouraging it is when we discover that our hero is stricken mute when the danger he has fought so long, so fiercely—and so safely—from afar now perches on his knee. It is sad to realize that what Mr. Wiggins has been telling us these many years is that we must do as he says, not as he does.

And, Mr. Speaker, as recently as January 24, we find that a columnist for this paragon of editorial freedom, the Washington Post and Times Herald, devotes most of his space to democracy and public opinion. He says, and I quote:

> Sound solutions can come only from public discussion.

I agree, Mr. Speaker. We all agree. Why, then, does not the Washington Post and Times Herald agree in practice as well as in word? We all know it has supported integration, as is its right. We ask only why does it refuse to express the other side? Was there something wrong with the advertisement offered?

This is unlikely. After the Washington Post and Times Herald rejected it, the ad was submitted to the Evening Star which accepted it gladly and ran the ad in its edition of Monday, January 26. I am reliably informed that the third Washington daily newspaper, the Daily News, also would have accepted it.

Further, the ad was not scurrilous, libelous, nor in bad taste. We can assume only that the Washington Post and Times Herald was fearful that the appearance of the advertisement would set off some sort of demonstration, unrest, or dissatisfaction in the District among the races. If that is so, then we must assume further that what the newspaper has been broadcasting to its readers about the success of integration in the District just simply is not the truth. If this one ad could unplug a safety valve, then integration here is not yet a proven way of life. And yet it is the way of life the Washington Post and Times Herald is demanding for the entire Nation. For what purpose? So one ad, appearing in the Nation's press can cause a national upheaval?

It was not until I accused the newspaper of "gross betrayal of responsible journalism" by refusing the ad that the Washington Post and Times Herald made reference to the Putnam letter at all. The paper did so in a 2-paragraph story, buried among the theater ads, devoted to my speech.

That is rather entering by the back door, for the Putnam letter did receive notice, in the final analysis, in the Washington Post and Times Herald.

This entire episode which I have outlined to you has been printed as news stories in the Birmingham Post-Herald. I ask that these articles be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

One last word. I say to the Washington Post and Times Herald, "Furthermore when I want the facts, I always read them in the Star."

AS PAID ADVERTISEMENT, WASHINGTON NEWSPAPER REJECTS PUTNAM LETTER

A Washington, D.C., daily newspaper has refused to publish the Putnam letter as an advertisement.

James E. Simpson, chairman and treasurer of the Putnam Letter Committee, said here yesterday the committee was advised the Washington Post and Times Herald had refused to accept the advertisement.

The Putnam letter advertisement had been sent to the newspaper for publication Monday at a cost of $1,500.

Mr. Simpson denounced the refusal of the Washington Post and Times Herald as a violation of the principles of a free press and an arrogant affront to the South.

"It is incredible," he said, "that a newspaper published in our Nation's Capital should refuse to accept as a paid advertisement the fine statement of Mr. Carleton Putnam, which voices the views of the South on current problems facing our region."

Simpson, expressing the indignation of the committee, continued: "This action, in the committee's opinion * * * is especially astounding in view of the fact the Putnam letter was accepted and published as an advertisement by the New York Times."

He also pointed out the letter was published without charge in the news columns of the Christian Science Monitor.

"Few have given us the opportunity to present our case in their news column to the court of public opinion. But this is the first time any newspaper has gone so far as to refuse us the opportunity to pay for the privilege of stating our stand.

"This refusal marks a new low in journalism in the United States of America," Simpson said.

Contributions to the Putnam letter fund totaled $10,028 through Thursday. Nearly 10 percent came from citizens in Northern and Western States, Simpson said.

WASHINGTON NEWSPAPER MUM ON PUTNAM LETTER

(By Gene Wortsman)

WASHINGTON, January 20.—Top officials of the Washington Post and Times Herald have refused comment or gave incomplete replies as to why they rejected the Putnam letter as a paid advertisement.

A Birmingham Post-Herald reporter, seeking this answer, was referred from an advertising salesman to the general advertising manager to two vice presidents of the newspaper to the publisher.

The publisher had gone for the day when he was called.

James E. Simpson, Birmingham, chairman of the Putnam Letter Committee, said last week the Washington newspaper refused to run the ad.

The story gave no reason for the rejection.

Russel E. Baker, general advertising manager of the Washington newspaper, said "the decision was split by the barest margin."

He said the ad went to a group of newspaper officials to determine if it was libelous or in bad taste.

"There was certainly no libel," Baker said, "and the question of bad taste probably was a factor. The general consensus among our top people, even though the New York Times took it, was that this was a borderline case. We decided to pass it by."

He said it doesn't mean that the paper wouldn't take an ad on the subject of integration, which is the topic of the Putnam letter to President Eisenhower.

He said his newspaper serves as "a kind of sounding board for many people. We think it is a good thing to have a safety valve of some sort."

Baker was asked in what manner the ad was in bad taste.

He said he wasn't present when the final decision was made.

He was asked what safety valve was involved that his newspaper felt it must protect.

He said that since he was not present for the decision, it would be advisable to call John W. Sweeterman, vice president and general manager. Baker also suggested calling Adrian Fisher, vice president and counsel for the newspaper.

Mr. Fisher was out.

Sweeterman's reply was somewhat different from that of Baker.

"I would rather not comment," Sweeterman said. "We usually don't when we accept copy or reject copy. The decision," he added, "was actually made by the publisher."

Sweeterman was asked for comment on Baker's statement that "bad taste" was a factor in the decision.

"I would just rather not comment," he replied.

A secretary in the office of the publisher, Philip L. Graham, asked the reporter if he could not obtain what he wanted elsewhere.

He replied that he was told the decision concerning the ad was made by Mr. Graham.

"I don't know when he could have made it," she said. "He hasn't been in."

She was told the decision apparently came last week and replied that Graham had been in his office for a short time during the week. She said Graham will be in his office tomorrow.

(By Gene Wortsman)

WASHINGTON, January 20.—The publisher of the Washington Post and Times Herald today requested tolerance and understanding in his refusal to tell why he rejected the Putnam letter as a paid ad.

Another official who has been cited in his battles for freedom of the press refused curtly to discuss the ad at all.

Publisher Philip L. Graham accepted the responsibiltiy for turning down the advertisement.

He said the only comment he would have about it was that he decided not to run it.

Asked why, Graham said that 12 years ago he stopped explaining his action in refusing to run something as an ad in his newspaper.

He said he had found that explanations failed to bring satisfaction.

Also, he said, discussing them would be a full-time job; implying that the Washington Post refuses to publish numerous items offered as paid ads.

Graham pointed out that his newspaper is presented many institutional advertisements.

Some come from Communists as well as rightwingers, he explained.

He indicated that his paper could not run every ad offered.

"I * * * hope you will be tolerant and try to understand my silence," Graham said.

The Washington newspaper refused the ad last week although it has appeared free in numerous newspapers and as an ad in the New York Times.

The subject of the ad is a letter written to President Eisenhower by Carleton Putnam, Washington, favoring the southern position on integration.

Another Washington Post official, J. R. Wiggins, referred all inquiries to Publisher Graham.

Wiggins is a vice president and executive editor of the paper.

He is a former chairman of the Committee on Freedom of Information of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

Almost a year ago today—on January 25, 1958—the University of Arizona's journalism department gave him its John Peter Zenger Freedom of the Press Award.

Wiggins primarily has been concerned with governmental secrecy.

A reporter for the Birmingham Post-Herald telephoned Wiggins in his former capacity as chairman of the Freedom of Information Committee.

Wiggins, however, abruptly referred all questions to Graham who, he said, makes policy for the paper.

It was pointed out to Wiggins that his advice was being sought in order to aid a reporter in obtaining facts for a story.

Wiggins indicated awareness that the reporter also was seeking statements from him to use in the story.

He said it was a futile endeavor to try and get him to talk and redirected all questions to the publisher.

Wiggins said he was familiar with the subject in dispute but refused any comment on whether he considered the Putnam letter libelous or in bad taste.

PAPER WHICH REFUSED AD IS CRITICIZED—REPRESENTATIVE HUDDLESTON CALLS WASHINGTON POST'S ACTION "INSULT"

(By Gene Wortsman)

WASHINGTON, January 21.—Representative GEORGE HUDDLESTON, Jr., today said the refusal of a Washington newspaper to run the Putnam letter advertisement is a "gross betrayal of responsible journalism."

"Those of us who are familiar with the policies of the Washington Post and Times Herald in its handling of the news may not be surprised," he added.

"But I deplore and resent bitterly this insult and lack of consideration for the views of my constituents," HUDDLESTON declared.

HUDDLESTON put his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

He pointed out that the Putnam letter on integration had been run in many newspapers as either a letter to the editor or as a news item.

Newspapers did this, said HUDDLESTON, "regardless of whether (the letter) supports the established policies of their editors and publishers."

He said that the author of the letter, Carleton Putnam, is not a Southerner but of an old New England family, a native of New York.

"His letter presents so completely and so eloquently that position long held by the South on this issue, that it has received wide publicity in our section of the country," the Congressman said.

HUDDLESTON said Birmingham citizens, impressed by the letter, have made efforts to have it distributed in other sections of the country.

Where a newspaper would not run the letter as news, HUDDLESTON said, the Birmingham citizens bought space for it.

The Washington Post and Times Herald turned it down as a news item or letter to the editor, something which HUDDLESTON said was the newspaper's privilege.

Though, he added, insistence of the paper to print only one side of the issue "shows an appalling and disturbing lack of objectivity on their part."

When the letter was offered to the Washington paper as an ad it was flatly refused, HUDDLESTON said.

"I say * * * that this attitude, this refusal, is a flagrant violation of our most sacred tenet, freedom of expression," HUDDLESTON declared. "I protest most vigorously, as must all Americans who hold this principle to be meaningful to us and essential to the preservation of the American way of life, this affront to the South, this insult to liberty, this wholly indefensible position.

"Those of us who are familiar with the policies of the Washington Post and Times Herald in its handling of the news may not be surprised at this gross betrayal of responsible journalism.

"But," HUDDLESTON said, "I deplore and resent bitterly this insult and lack of consideration for the views of my constituents."

DECLINED BY RIVAL PAPER—PUTNAM LETTER TO GO IN WASHINGTON STAR

Declined by one Washington, D.C., daily as an advertisement, the Putnam letter will be published by a rival afternoon paper.

The Washington Star, an evening paper with a circulation of 258,434, yesterday informed James E. Simpson it would "be happy" to publish the letter.

Simpson is chairman of the Putnam Letter Fund.

Earlier, the Washington Post and Times Herald, a larger Capital daily, had declined to publish the prosouthern tract on integration versus segregation.

Simpson yesterday received confirmation of the Post and Times Herald's rejection:

"We regret to inform you," it said, "that we prefer not to run copy on the subject."

It further added, confirming a telephone declination earlier, that "should you submit copy on this subject or allied matter, we shall consider the copy fairly and objectively."

The Star, Simpson said, will publish the letter as an advertisement in its January 26 edition.

The Putnam letter, addressed to the President by a New Englander, rejects forced integration.

It had been published earlier in the New York Times and the Christian Science Monitor (three editions), subsidized by funds raised by donations to the Putnam Letter Fund.

In September when it was first published in the Post-Herald, it drew mail from all over the Nation and was reprinted and mailed to Post-Herald readers on request.

The Putnam Letter Fund, headed by Simpson, was formed shortly after publication of the letter in the Post-Herald.

Simpson yesterday announced the committee had raised a total of $10,568.11 toward publication in large U.S. dailies.

The committee next will approach the Chicago Tribune, a pro-Republican daily with the largest Midwest circulation, Simpson said.

PAPER WHICH REFUSED PUTNAM AD ONCE PRINTED ANTI-DIXIE LETTER

(By Gene Wortsman)

WASHINGTON, January 22.—The Washington Post and Times Herald, which has refused the Putnam letter as a paid advertisement, ran an ad on the other side of the civil rights question in its edition of July 30, 1957.

This was in the form of an open letter from the South.

Five columns wide, the ad was 16 inches deep.

It urged the U.S. Senate which was debating the civil rights bill, to approve the bill without a provision calling for jury trials.

Southern Senators at that time were demanding that the bill guarantee jury trials.

As finally enacted, the measure did call for a jury trial if a judge sentenced the defendant to more than 45 days or fined him in excess of $300. (The defendant, in other words, would have two trials.)

There were 90 signatures on the Washington Post ad which was coordinated by the Southern Conference Educational Fund Inc. (SCEF).

The ad said adoption of the jury trial provision would only cripple the enforcement of the law.

It said the jury trials would be a weapon of delay to indefinitely withhold the right to vote.

"It would be better not to pass any civil rights legislation at all than to pass a bill which limits the power of courts to enforce their orders," the letter in the ad read.

Among the signers of the letter were Aubrey W. Williams, Montgomery, former publisher of Southern Farm and Home. He signed as president of SCEF.

In 1954, the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee found that SCEF had Communist tendencies.

The Washington Post, meanwhile, gave its first recognition today to the Putnam letter, written by a resident of Washington and calling for continued segregation of the races.

On page B–11, among the entertainment ads, the newspaper ran a two-paragraph story about the letter.

This was the story:

"Representative GEORGE HUDDLESTON, Jr., Democrat, of Alabama, yesterday said the Washington Post was guilty of 'gross betrayal of responsible journalism' for refusing to publish a statement on segregation offered its advertising department as a paid ad.

"HUDDLESTON, in remarks to the House and in a statement for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, referred to a statement by 'Charleton' [the paper's spelling] Putnam of Washington, D.C. The Congressman said Putnam's statement 'presents the position long held by the South on the segregation issue.' "

J. R. Wiggins, former chairman of the American Society of Newspaper Editors' Freedom of Information Committee, is vice president and executive editor of the Washington Post.

PRESS GROUP ATTACKS WASHINGTON POST

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., January 24.—The Alabama Press Association today condemned the Washington Post and Times Herald for refusing to carry as a paid advertisement a letter in favor of segregation. A private Alabama group is publishing the letter in northern and western newspapers as an expression of southern views on racial segregation. The press association resolution was proposed by Col. Harry M. Ayers, publisher of the Anniston Star.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services may sit during the sessions of the House during the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

HOUSING AND NURSING HOMES FOR THE AGED

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation in regard to nursing homes and homes for the aged. This is a very important subject at this time. Due to the many improvements, advancements and achievements in medical science and pharmaceutical professions, there are now five times as many people 65 years of age and over as there were in 1900. Nursing homes, using the overall view, fill a definite set of needs—economic, social, medical, and religious. The main problem, of course, is to provide adequate care for the aged and infirm who either are not or cannot be cared for in their own establishments. This need might stem from various factors—the aged individuals involved might not wish to care for themselves, they might require nursing care of a sort that will not allow them to care for themselves. Personality difficulties peculiar to age might make habitation with members of their families difficult, if not impossible, and, of course, space might not be available in the home—because of modern day compact living—to care for an aged person. Whatever the reason, there are many environmental and social pressures in our society today to add to the sheer medical needs of the patient—the outcome has been the evolution of the specialized institution known as the nursing home. Today 71 percent of the available beds for care of the aged and chronically ill are found in proprietary facilities as compared with 15 percent in the publicly owned facilities and 14 percent in the nonprofit facilities. Despite this great predominance of care for the aged in proprietary nursing homes, Federal support and financing of these homes has been directed almost entirely to the nonprofit, and tax supported institutions.

The only exception of this occurred approximately 2 years ago or more when the Small Business Administration broadened its program to include 10-year loans to proprietary nursing and convalescent homes. Using my area as an example—because of the high operating costs of a home of this type and the low margin of profit, it would be impossible to pay back a sizable loan in 10 years. What these people need is a long-term loan, with an interest rate that would enable them to equip and run their establishment, including maximum benefits for all concerned, without sacrificing any of these benefits in any way. Dr. H. B. Mulholland, chairman of the American Medical Association's committee on aging, stated in his pamphlet, "Health Aspects of Aging":

It is common knowledge that many general hospitals are now caring for patients who would be better off in the less expensive structure. A committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Howard Rusk several months ago surveyed the city hospitals of New York City and found that 20 percent of their patients should be in such an institution, where they could be cared for at a rate of $6 or $7 per day as compared with the average rate of $21 in New York City hospitals. Not only is the cost less but they are not surrounded with sick people, but live in an atmosphere in which they are stimulated to become self-sufficient.

If you will pardon a personal example, my own mother spent her last years in a nursing home, because she preferred to be with people approximately her own age, and because her health fared better where it could receive the attention given in a home of this type.

I believe we can use an even closer personal example when we consider that any of us, given the opportunity to live to a very old age, might require a home of this type. Would any one of us be prepared to spend, or have someone spend for us approximately $300 a month for lodging and medicine—this is the present going rate in my area for this type of care. I certainly feel that something should be done to cause the years added to our lives by medical science to be as free from care and worry as possible.

I feel that my bill includes benefits which are directly applicable to my area and other areas and I certainly do hope it will be enacted into law.

COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. O'BRIEN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs may be permitted to sit during sessions of the House during the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

AREA REDEVELOPMENT

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I take this minute to advise my colleagues on both sides of the aisle that with the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois, Mr. DOUGLAS, I am together with him today introducing the new area redevelopment bill. I also wish to advise my colleagues that the senior Senator from Illinois has prepared an address which he will make in the other body today. Later today, I will make a prepared address on the same subject here. I have sent an analysis of the bill to all Members of the House. I invite you to place your names upon a similar bill as soon as possible.

LESS-THAN-HONORABLE DISCHARGES

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include appropriate matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to report to the House that I have recently received from the Department of Defense what I am sure will be welcomed by every Member of this House who was, in the 85th Congress and is again in this 86th Congress, so vitally concerned about the subject of less than honorable discharges. To bring you along with me as to developments since the close of the 85th Congress, I present the text of four letters which specifically bear upon the subject matter. The first letter by me dated August 13 to the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense, next, his letter of acknowledgment, dated December 24, 1958, third, my letter to him, dated December 31, 1958, and finally a letter to me dated January 16, 1959, enclosing the text of a Department of Defense directive dated January 14, 1959, on the subject of administrative discharges Directive No. 1332.14. You will note from the letter of January 16 that Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense, Stephen S. Jackson, calls my attention to the fact that this establishment of uniform standards, particularly with respect to those military discharges less than honorable, resulting from administrative action by the services, represents the culmination of many months of work.

During the 85th Congress, you will recall your special subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee, which held public hearings on the subject of less than honorable discharges in connection with bill H. R. 8772, which later passed the House by a vote of 226 to 8, but did not get consideration of the Senate committee in time to move forward, expressed the viewpoint that it was highly desirable that there be a uniform code of standards and procedures governing the administrative discharges of enlisted persons from the Armed Forces. I am sure that, by making the text of this new uniform code relating to such discharges available to all Members of this Congress, we will all be better informed and better enabled to more promptly and fully represent any meritorious interest of any of our constituents in this area.

You will note from section 2 that this uniform code, which I am informed is the first ever adopted by the Defense Department, is made applicable to the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, and even including the Coast Guard and all Reserve components thereof. In submitting this welcome information to you, I desire to extend my compliments to the Secretary of Defense, Neil McElroy, who signed this history-making directive and all his associates, for issuing this timely and I believe very much worthwhile and very significant directive.

I am also pleased to supply you with the full text of the report furnished me on December 24, 1958, by the Deputy Assistant Secretary, Stephen Jackson, in cooperating with my request on August 13, 1958, for such information. I wish to say, however, that in my letter of August 13, 1958, I did not ask that this important data be furnished me until Christmas time.

In closing, I inform the House that Hon. CARL VINSON, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, has already asked the Pentagon for a report on H.R. 88 and all the other numbered bills on the same subject and I am urging earliest possible reports on these bills back to the Armed Services Committee to which the bills on this subject were all referred. Chairman VINSON has suggested that since the special subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee held such long, inclusive and comprehensive hearings during the 85th Congress that it may not be necessary and appropriate to hold further hearings on these bills.

It is suggested that some of the Members who are interested in the adoption of legislation on this important subject during this 86th Congress may have, through mistake, taken the text of H.R. 8772 of the 85th Congress and filed it in this 86th Congress; when they intended to take the text of H.R. 88 in this 86th Congress and file it as their revised bill. There is one major difference between H.R. 8772 of the 85th Congress and H.R. 88 of the 86th Congress—the Doyle bill—which is that the designation of the document for H.R. 8772 proposed to be issued by the military was "General Discharge Limited," while under H.R. 88 that document is entitled "Exemplary Rehabilitation Certificate."

In reply to queries asked of me recently, I will state that I have informed the military that this very splendid uniform codification of administrative discharges so recently issued under No. 1332 does not, however, take the place of or necessity of, nor does it go into the field which is entered by, H.R. 88 and related bills. So, may I make it clear that these marked advances made by the military since the hearings by the House Armed Services Special Subcommittee during the 85th Congress are duly recognized as splendid improvements, but they nevertheless, do not and cannot from the nature of the total situation involved, be a substitute for the existing and continuing necessity of the military acting further, and in another advanced step which is proposed in H.R. 88 and companion bills, to wit: to issue an exemplary rehabilitation certificate to those formerly expelled from the military establishments with less than honorable discharge for relatively minor offenses; provided always that such person fully proves to the military itself, that he has earned such action during not less than 3 years of his civilian life. It will help remove some of the life stigma attaching to less than honorable discharges. It will also help a deserving man to get a chance to earn a decent living and hold his head up. Let us treat a deserving man in a truly humane manner.

AUGUST 13, 1958.

Hon. STEPHEN S. JACKSON,
Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Thank you again for past courtesies. I now respectfully request as follows: That by December 15, 1958, you have brought to my attention at my office here in Washington an itemized report on the subject of less-than-honorable discharges of the total Military Establishment which will supplement the information heretofore furnished as to the number of such discharges and the types thereof and the reasons therefor, the ages of the men, whether or not they were court-martialed, and any other pertinent, informative data which will help us in our further study of the problem. Said report should begin at the date when you furnished the information in the last report and to continue down to December 1, 1958.

Also, Mr. Secretary, I will thank you to also furnish me the supplemental information down to December 1, 1958, supplemental to your communication in the matter of "Applications for Reenlistment From Persons Discharged Under Less-Than-Honorable Conditions September 1957 to April 1958."

It now appears that the Armed Services Committee of the House will again continue to be interested in this important subject as the 86th Congress opens.

Thanking you and with personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

CLYDE DOYLE,
Member of Congress.

P.S.—If such information can come forward to me with an original and three carbon copies thereof, it will be very much appreciated.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., December 24, 1958.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: Your letter of August 13 requested certain data on the subject of less-than-honorable discharges of the military departments, to supplement information previously furnished to you. Your letter of December 19 asked that the data be forwarded before the Christmas holidays. The requested reports are attached.

In compiling this information we have attempted to place the reporting on a fiscal year basis, insofar as possible, to coincide with established reporting procedures within the services. It is believed that this will result in a more orderly presentation of information for your use.

A closing date of October 31 was used for applications for reenlistment from persons discharged under less-than-honorable conditions (table 5), in lieu of the December 1 date you requested. Data for the month of November 1958 are not yet available. Further, no information on this subject has been included in the Marine Corps' regular statistical reporting system up to this time. This omission is not believed to alter substantially the over-all Department of Defense figures attached. The Marine Corps is initiating action to have the information available in the future.

I trust the attached reports will meet your needs.

Sincerely yours,

STEPHEN S. JACKSON,
Deputy Assistant Secretary.

P.S.—I regret the delay. This material reached my desk at 2:40 p.m. this date. Cordial good wishes for a happy Christmas.

S. S. J.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 31, 1958.

Hon. STEPHEN S. JACKSON,
Deputy Assistant Secretary,
Department of Defense,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Thank you for remitting to me with your letter of December 24 certain data on the subject of less-than-honorable discharges of the military departments, to supplement information previously furnished. This was in accordance with my request for data in my letter to you of August 13, 1958. Thank you.

I intend to file a bill on the same subject promptly in the 86th Congress. It would be very much appreciated if, during the 86th Congress, there was not the extended and protracted delays somewhere along the line in connection with the subject matter (which delays were not in the House of Representatives). We intend to again approach the subject in an attitude of mind and approach as one of thoroughly conscientious study and decision. Much thought has naturally gone into the problem during the congressional recess.

Wishing you and your associates a happy New Year and appreciating the courtesies extended, I have the honor to be,

Sincerely yours,

CLYDE DOYLE,
Member of Congress.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, D.C., January 16, 1959.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. DOYLE: During the numerous conferences between members of our respective staffs concerning less-than-honorable discharges of military personnel, you have frequently expressed interest in the establishment of uniform standards, particularly with respect to those discharges resulting from administrative action by the services.

I am pleased to furnish you herewith information copies of Department of Defense directive 1332.14, approved for publication by the Secretary of Defense this week. This directive, establishing uniform standards and procedures for the administrative separation of enlisted personnel, represent the culmination of many months of work.

We believe that this directive will accomplish, within its sphere, the same beneficial results achieved by the Uniform Code of Military Justice in the area of punitive discharge.

Sincerely yours,

STEPHEN S. JACKSON,
Deputy Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE DIRECTIVE—ADMINISTRATIVE DISCHARGES

I. PURPOSE AND CANCELLATIONS

This directive revises the standards and procedures governing the administrative discharge of enlisted persons from the Armed Forces. The referenced memorandums and any other existing regulations in conflict with the provisions of this directive are superseded and canceled 90 days after date of issue of this directive.

II. APPLICABILITY

The policies and regulations set forth herein are applicable to the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, the Marine Corps, and, by agreement with the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Coast Guard, and to all Reserve components thereof.

III. ADMINISTRATION

Each of the Armed Forces to which these policies and regulations are applicable will, prior to the cancellation date of the referenced memorandums, issue appropriate regulations under this directive.

IV. DEFINITIONS

A. Military behavior as used herein refers to the conduct of the individual while a member of an armed service.

B. Military record as used herein includes an individual's military behavior and performance of duty, and reflects the character of the service he has rendered while a member of an armed service.

C. Honorable discharge: An honorable discharge is a separation from an armed service with honor.

D. General discharge: A general discharge is a separation from an armed service under honorable conditions of an individual whose military record is not sufficiently meritorous to warrant an honorable discharge.

V. PRESERVICE ACTIVITIES

Except for misrepresentations (including omissions) made in connection with his enlistment or induction, activities that a member of the Armed Forces engaged in before he acquired status in the Armed Forces may not be considered in determining the type and character of discharge or separation to be issued. The type and character of the discharge will be determined solely by the member's military record.

VI. STANDARDS FOR DISCHARGE

The type and character of discharge or separation and the reasons therefor will be determined in accordance with the following standards:

A. Honorable discharge: Issuance of an honorable discharge is conditioned upon:

1. Proper military behavior. Ordinarily, an honorable discharge will not be issued if an individual has been convicted of an offense by general court martial or has been convicted by more than one special court martial in the current enlistment, period of obligated service, or any extensions thereof.

2. Proficient and industrious performance of duty having due regard to the rate, rank, or grade held and the capabilities of the individual concerned.

3. Eligibility for discharge by virtue of one of the following reasons:

(a) Expiration of enlistment or fulfillment of service obligation, as applicable.
(b) Convenience of the Government.
(c) Hardship or dependency.
(d) Minority.
(e) Disability.
(f) Unsuitability.
(g) Security.
(h) When directed by the Secretary of the department concerned.
(i) Resignation—own convenience.

Special considerations: An individual may, when otherwise ineligible, receive an honorable discharge if he has, during his current enlistment, period of obligated service, or any extensions thereof, received a personal decoration as defined by the respective services, or is discharged as a result of a disability incured in line of duty. In each of the above situations, the individual's military record should form the basis for the action taken.

B. General discharge: Issuance of a general discharge is conditioned upon:

1. Military record not sufficiently meritorious to warrant an honorable discharge.

2. Eligibility for discharge by virtue of one of the reasons listed in VI A 3.

C. Undesirable discharge: An undesirable discharge is an administrative separation from the service "Under conditions other than honorable." It is issued for unfitness, misconduct or for security reasons. It will not be issued in lieu of trial by court-martial except upon the determination by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction or by higher authority that the interests of the service as well as the individual will best be served by administrative discharge.

Special considerations: Notwithstanding the foregoing, whenever the particular circumstances in a given case so warrant, an administrative discharge other than an undesirable discharge may be issued.

VII. REASONS FOR DISCHARGE

A. Expiration of enlistment or fulfillment of service obligation (as applicable). Discharge with an honorable or a general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record (par. VI A or B, as applicable).

B. Convenience of the Government: Discharge with an honorable or a general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record, for the following reasons:

1. General demobilization, reduction in authorized strength or by an order applicable to all members of a class of personnel specified in the order.

2. Acceptance of a commission or appointment in any branch of the Armed Services, for active duty only.

3. National health, safety, or interest.

4. To permit immediate enlistment or reenlistment.

5. Erroneous induction or enlistment.

6. To provide for the discharge of individuals serving in unspecified enlistment.

7. In the case of women, marriage, pregnancy, parenthood, or custody of children under age 18.

8. For other good and sufficient reasons when determined by the Secretary of the Department concerned.

C. Resignation—own convenience: Discharge with an honorable or a general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record, on an individual basis, in accordance with regulations of the service concerned. Such discharge may be effected as early release for the convenience of the Government.

D. Dependency or hardship: Discharge or separation or release by reason of dependency or hardship with an honorable or a general discharge, as warranted by the individual's military record. Discharge may be directed when it is considered that undue and genuine dependency or hardship exists, that the hardship or dependency is not of a temporary nature, and that conditions have arisen or been aggravated to an excessive degree since entry into the service and the member has made every reasonable effort by means of application for family allowance and voluntary contributions which have proven inadequate; that the discharge of the individual will result in the elimination of, or will materially alleviate the condition and that there are no means of alleviation readily available other than by such discharge.

Undue hardship does not necessarily exist solely because of altered present or expected income or because the individual is separated from his family or must suffer the inconveniences normally incident to military service.

E. Minority: Discharge by reason of minority with an honorable or general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record, or release by voidance of enlistment upon determination that the individual's age was misrepresented upon enlistment or induction as follows:

1. Males, if enlisted and under 17 years of age, or inducted and under 18 years and 6 months of age, when verified, release from military control by discharge, release or voidance of enlistment.

2. If an enlisted man, enlisted without proper consent and having passed his 17th birthday, but not his 18th birthday, discharge upon application of parent or legal guardian as prescribed by law.

3. If an enlisted man having passed his 18th birthday when verified—retain if otherwise qualified.

4. Females, if enlisted and under 18 years of age, or inducted and under the age prescribed by law for such induction, release from military control by discharge, release, or voidance of enlistment.

5. If an enlisted woman enlisted without proper consent, having passed her 18th birthday, but not her 21st birthday, when verified—discharge upon application of parent or legal guardian as prescribed by law.

NOTE.—The enlistment of a minor with false representation as to age without proper consent will not in itself be considered as fraudulent enlistment.

F. Disability: Discharge by reason of physical disability, with an honorable or general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record, when it has been determined as a result of medical findings that the individual is physically unfit to perform the duties of his office, rank, grade, or rating.

G. Unsuitability: Discharge by reason of unsuitability, with an honorable or general discharge as warranted by the individual's military record. Such discharge will be effected when it has been determined that an individual is unsuitable for further military service because of:

1. Inaptitude: Applicable to those persons who are best described as inapt, due to lack of general adaptability, want or readiness of skill, unhandiness, or inability to learn.

2. Character and behavior disorders: Character and behavior disorders, disorders of intelligence, and transient personality disorders due to acute or special stress as defined in "Joint Armed Forces Nomenclature and Method of Recording Psychiatric Conditions—1949" (SR 40–1025–2; NavMed P–1303; AFR 160–13A).

3. Apathy, defective attitudes and inability to expend effort constructively: As a significant observable defect, apparently beyond the control of the individual, elsewhere not readily describable.

4. Enuresis.

5. Alcoholism: Chronic, or addiction to alcohol.

6. Homosexual tendencies.

7. Special considerations: For other good and sufficient reasons when determined by the Secretary of the Department concerned.

H. Security: Discharge with the character of discharge and under conditions stipulated by the Secretary of Defense in directives which deal explicitly with this matter when retention is not clearly consistent with the interest of national security.

I. Unfitness: Discharge by reason of unfitness, with an undesirable discharge, unless the particular circumstances in a given case warrant a general or honorable discharge, when it has been determined that an individual's military record is characterized by one or more of the following:

1. Frequent involvement of a discreditable nature with civil or military authorities.

2. Sexual perversion.

3. Drug addiction or the unauthorized use or possession of habit-forming narcotic drugs or marijuana.

4. An established pattern for shirking.

5. An established pattern showing dishonorable failure to pay just debts.

6. For other good and sufficient reasons when determined by the Secretary concerned.

J. Misconduct: Discharge by reason of misconduct, "with an undesirable discharge, unless the particular circumstances in a given case warrant a general or honorable discharge, when one or more of the following conditions have been determined:

1. Conviction by civil authorities (foreign or domestic) or action taken which is tantamount to a finding of guilty of an offense for which the maximum penalty under the UCMJ is death or confinement in excess of 1 year; or which involves moral turpitude; or where the offender is adjudged a juvenile delinquent, wayward minor, or youthful offender as a result of an offense involving moral turpitude. If the offense is not listed in the MCM Table of Maximum Punishments or is not closely related to an offense listed therein, the maximum punishments authorized by the United States Code or the District of Columbia Code, whichever is lesser, applies. For the purpose of this subparagraph only, an individual shall be considered as having been convicted even though an appeal is pending or is subsequently filed.

2. Procurement of a fraudulent enlistment, induction or period of obligated service through any deliberate material misrepresentation or concealment which, except for such misrepresentation or concealment, may have resulted in rejection.

3. Prolonged unauthorized absence. When unauthorized continuous absence of 1 year or more has been established but punitive discharge has not been authorized by competent authority.

VIII. PROCEDURES FOR DISCHARGE

In accordance with the standards hereinbefore outlined, the following procedures will be adhered to in effecting administrative discharges:

A. Honorable discharge: A separation with an honorable discharge may be effected by the individual's commanding officer or higher authority when the individual is eligible for or subject to discharge and it has been determined that he merits an Honorable Discharge under the prescribed standards.

B. General discharge: A separation with a general discharge may be effected by the individual's commanding officer or higher authority when the individual is eligible for or is subject to discharge and it has been determined under the prescribed standards and in accordance with any prescribed administrative procedures that a general discharge is warranted.

C. Discharge for unsuitability: An individual recommended for an honorable or general discharge for reason of unsuitability shall be afforded the opportunity to make a statement in his own behalf.

D. Undesirable discharge: An undesirable discharge will be effected only by authority of a properly approved administrative action conforming to the prescribed standards, during which the following procedures and safeguards have been observed:

1. The individual if subject to such discharge will, if his whereabouts is known, be properly advised of the basis for the contemplated action and afforded an opportunity to request or waive, in writing, the following privileges:

(a) To have his case heard by a board of not less than three officers. In the case of nonregular component members, all boards so convened shall include appropriate numbers from the Reserve components. In the case of female members, all boards so convened shall include at least one female officer.

(b) To appear in person before such board, subject to his availability, e.g., not in civil confinement.

(c) To be represented by counsel, who, if reasonably available, should be a lawyer.

(d) To submit statements in his own behalf.

2. Separation with an undesirable discharge may be effected by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction or by higher authority (including departmental headquarters) after review of the findings and recommendations made by any board which was convened to consider the case.

3. Except for reservists, departmental secretaries are authorized to waive the requirements set forth in paragraph 1, above (except 1d) when such action is deemed in the best interest of the military service. Departmental secretaries will advise the Assistant Secretary of Defense (manpower, personnel, and Reserve) by memorandum not later than July 15 each year of any such actions taken during the preceding fiscal year, and the reasons therefor. The reporting requirement of this paragraph has been assigned report control symbol DD–MP&R(A)370.

IX. IMPLEMENTATION

Each military department will forward copies of implementing instructions to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (manpower, personnel, and Reserve) within 90 days after date of this directive.

NEIL MCELROY,
Secretary of Defense.

STABLE PRICE LEVELS

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Employment Act of 1946 sets forth as the policy of this Government to promote and maintain maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. Yesterday, I introduced an amendment to the act to provide that it is our policy to do so at stable price levels. I have also proposed to amend section 4 of the act requesting the Council of Economic Advisers and the President to provide us with suitable policies to promote and maintain maximum employment, production, and purchasing power at stable price levels. A clear statement of policy by this Congress, plus appropriate legislative and executive action in support of this policy, is desperately needed to meet the number one domestic issue of our times, namely, how to secure adequate economic expansion without inflation.

I ask unanimous consent to include a copy of the amendment in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 2 of the Employment Act of 1946 (15 U.S.C., sec. 1021) is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof the following: "at stable price levels".

(b) Paragraph (4) of subsection (c) of section 4 of the Employment Act of 1946 (15 U.S.C., sec. 1023(c)(4)) is amended by striking out "employment, production, and purchasing power" and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "maximum employment, production, and purchasing power at stable price levels".

JOSEPH H. FREEHILL

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, the death last Wednesday of Joseph H. Freehill took from northern Virginia, and from the Nation, a great and good man—a fine, constructive, vigorous leader.

Our hearts go out to Mary Freehill and their six children in this time of sorrow.

Many of the Members of this Congress knew and admired Joe Freehill. He was a man of tremendous capacity, limitless energy, and good sense. He used his talents unstintingly in wholehearted public service and effective political action.

Joe Freehill's contributions to northern Virginia, as a member and chairman of the Fairfax board of county supervisors, as the Democratic candidate for Congress, and as a civic-minded attorney and citizen, were numberless. And he gave distinguished service to the Federal Government as counsel to numerous agencies and last director of the Office of Price Stabilization.

Joe Freehill never ducked an issue. In his last speech, which he never delivered, he summed up his own philosophy in these words:

> We must take strong stands if we are to go into the arena and do battle for the things in which we believe; else others will decide our future for us.

Joe Freehill had a profound appreciation of the necessity for keeping public schools open and operating. He had a sound sense of proportion concerning the responsibilities of the State government and the responsibilities of the local government in providing first class public education for children. His tact and talent were such that he had the respect of those whose views he did not share.

It is a tragedy that Joe Freehill was taken from us, at the young age of 50, with so much of his career still ahead. Of him one may say with Fortinbras:

> For he was likely, had he been put on, to have proved most royally.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in expressing my shock and sadness at the untimely death of Joseph H. Freehill, a great Democrat, whose courage and vision will be sorely missed. I want to extend my deepest sympathy to his family.

Hard work came naturally to Joe Freehill. He worked hard to get through school and he worked hard ever after. In each position he held, in the Federal Government, the Railroad Retirement Board and the Office of Price Stabilization, and in his own Fairfax County government, through diligence and hard work he rose to the top.

Joe and Mary Freehill were fortunate to have six children, and Joe's appreciation of the importance of young people can be seen not only in his family activities but in his community activities.

He was a leader in the Boy Scouts—not only in Virginia, but in the entire capital area. He was the head of the Falls Church High School Parent-Teachers Association for two terms. He was the head of drives for school funds for his own St. James Catholic Church. He took a leading role in the establishment of a juvenile detention home for northern Virginia. And while he had to devote much time to his private law practice and to a multitude of pressing local governmental problems, Joe Freehill always found time to devote to the improvement of the well-being of young people.

There can be no question that the intense demands which were made upon Joe Freehill accounted in large part for his great driving force; and there is also little question, I believe, that these same demands which he so generously met contributed to his untimely death.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY] may address the House for 1 minute, and revise and extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, Joe Freehill was a practical idealist who discovered early that merely thinking and talking from an armchair about the problems of the community did not solve these problems. As an idealist, Joe knew that the community in which he lived was dynamic; new problems arose which required new solutions.

Joe translated his ideas for the solution to these problems into reality by taking direct, personal, and immediate participation in community affairs.

Each day of community service provided one more stone to the monument that he built in Fairfax County. This monument exists in the hearts and minds of those who knew Joe as a devoted family man and dedicated citizen.

He was a "Doer of the Word." Joe's beloved wife and children will continue to draw inspiration from this fact. So also will all those who had the privilege of knowing and working with him.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BLATNIK] may address the House for 1 minute, and revise and extend his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, our democratic society is dependent on good men being elected to public office. The system can be only as good as the people elected.

In order to fill this great public need men must be not only willing to make the sacrifice of running for public office, but must be competent and able.

Joseph H. Freehill had this burning desire to serve. He, by virtue of his experience both in legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government, in his capacity as a supervisor of the Fairfax County government, and as an active participant in important community affairs, had demonstrated his ability and capacity to serve effectively in public office.

Joe Freehill was tenacious in bringing the issues to the voters forthrightly. It was an expression of his deep and abiding faith in democratic processes. While great and admirable was his splendid courage, he always had a kind, understanding thoughtfulness about him.

The effectiveness and warmth of his personality can be measured by the magnitude of the army of his friends and supporters. It would be a sad thing to lose the benefits of Joe Freehill's services at any time—it is a tragedy to lose them at this time.

PRIME MINISTER NKRUMAH

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, the new nation of Ghana, whose Prime Minister Nkrumah says he is a Marxist Socialist, has purchased a $750,000 yacht from the British. According to an Associated Press dispatch, the yacht "will be used to entertain distinguished foreign visitors."

This all figures to the right total. Nkrumah got the red carpet treatment when he came to Washington last summer on a money raising junket. What could be more fitting than a nice, plush yacht with which to show his appreciation when junketing Congressmen and other so-called VIP's come bounding o'er the main?

JUDICIAL MISINTERPRETATION OF CONGRESSIONAL INTENT

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill, H.R. 3193, to correct what I consider either a judicial misinterpretation of congressional intent or, in the alternative, a congressional failure to express its intent clearly.

In the case of Ladner against United States, decided by the Supreme Court on December 15, 1958, the defendant, while resisting arrest, had fired a shotgun and with the same shot wounded two Federal officers. He was tried and convicted under 18 U.S.C. 254, 1940 edition—now 18 U.S.C. 111, 1952 edition—for two offenses of assault. Separate jail penalties were imposed on both counts to run consecutively. On appeal, the Supreme Court held, in effect, that the two batteries constituted a single case of assault punishable as only one offense under the statute.

Possibly the court's decision can best be rationalized on the argument that, in drafting the statute, Congress failed to distinguish between an assault on the one hand and a battery on the other.

The purpose of a criminal statute is twofold, namely, first, to punish the commission of crime and, second, to deter the commission of crime. When the statute concerns physical violence, the use of a deadly weapon and the safety of law-enforcement authorities, this dual purpose can adequately be served only if multiple batteries on multiple victims resulting from a single act of assault entail separate penalties which, in the discretion of the court, can be imposed consecutively.

H.R. 3193 would clarify the statutory ambiguity and crystallize congressional intent. Any assault against more than one Federal officer which ripened into a physical battery on the body of at least one would actuate the new section 115 proposed in H.R. 3193, entitled "Assaults Which Include Batteries," and, upon conviction, the trial judge in his discretion could impose consecutive penalties. Thus, if a person, while resisting arrest, fires a single shot at a group of Federal officers and hits none, he is guilty of the single offense of assault on the group as defined in section 111. If he should wound one of the group, he would be guilty of two offenses, one under section 111 and another under section 115, namely, first, assault on the group and, second, an assault including battery on the wounded officer, and the judge could impose two consecutive penalties. If the person should wound two officers and miss the rest of the group, he would be guilty of three offenses, punishable separately and consecutively.

I earnestly trust that the Committee on the Judiciary will give early and favorable consideration to this bill.

NATIONAL CHILD EVANGELISM WEEK

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the week of February 22–March 1, 1959, has been designated as National Child Evangelism Week throughout the United States and Canada. Special services will be held in churches and other places during the week to alert the people of the United States and Canada to the need of Bible teaching for children.

Governors, mayors, and others will issue special proclamations. One of these proclamations, issued by the Governor of my own State of Kansas, reads in part:

> Whereas the delinquency problem of the country has been definitely linked with the lack of Bible teaching; and
> Whereas we feel that the program of child evangelism fellowship will go a long way toward reducing the delinquency problem, now, therefore, I, Gov. George Docking, of the State of Kansas, do hereby proclaim the week of February 22–March 1, 1959, as Child Evangelism Week in Kansas and urge the people of this State to participate in every phase of Child Evangelism Week.

The National Child Evangelism Fellowship, sponsors of Child Evangelism Week, states that there are more than 18 million children in our Nation who do not attend church. Last year nearly 1 million of these children were reached through approximately 15,000 volunteer workers—mostly women.

Many people refer to the present as the space age. It is also the young people's age or the children's age. More than 4 million babies were born last year in the United States. Delinquency is advancing at an alarming rate. J. Edgar Hoover and others have commended child evangelism fellowship as one of the important preventives for delinquency.

Child Evangelism Fellowship serves the church by channeling into the Sunday school the children contacted in the home Bible classes; giving the church contact with families who do not attend church; giving specialized training to Sunday school teachers and church workers; and making available the best in visual aids, Bible lessons, and teaching materials.

In addition to the home Bible classes, Child Evangelism Fellowship carries on an extensive summer program of camps for delinquent children. Often children are rescued from crime and delinquency through this camping program.

We trust that this program, sponsored by the National Child Evangelism Fellowship, will receive the approval and active support of church organizations throughout the country.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

OUR FEDERAL CONSTITUTION AND OUR SUPREME COURT

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for 40 minutes but I expect to take only 20, in order to give any Member who wishes at the close of my statement the opportunity to ask questions or to make remarks. I shall not yield until I am through with my statement.

Mr. Speaker, as newly elected Members of Congress we have recently taken our oath of office, solemnly swearing that we would "uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic." I wonder just how serious we were when we took that oath; and just what we expect to do in carrying out that oath. Or did we take the oath, as many people recite the Lord's Prayer, carelessly, unthinkingly, automatically, and impersonally?

Gladstone, a great English statesman, characterized our American Constitution as "the greatest public document ever stricken off by the hand of man at one sitting."

Mr. Speaker, that Constitution has been our charter for 170 years. It has been a blueprint for the building of the greatest Nation on earth; the Nation that provides the greatest opportunities for its people of any nation on earth; the Nation that provides the greatest amount of freedom to its people of any Nation on earth; and the Nation that has the highest standard of living for its people to enjoy of any nation on earth.

All these blessings are largely the result of the guarantees contained in the Constitution that our farseeing forefathers drew up and established 170 years ago. Is it any wonder that every real American looks upon that Constitution as a sacred document, a priceless document, a document to be preserved with our lives if necessary—not a document to be taken lightly and changed at the whim of every New Dealer, modern Republican, or Supreme Court Justice.

Mr. Speaker, the purposes the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted our Constitution are expressed in the preamble of that document. Every schoolchild should be required to memorize it:

> We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, some of the provisions of the Constitution have been the subject of much debate over the years. The historic Senate debates of 1830 between Webster and Calhoun over States rights under the Constitution is an example of how mental giants have honestly differed as to the real meaning of some of the provisions of the Constitution. When Andy Jackson was elected President in 1829 his southern friends decided to test him on the subject of "States Rights." So they held a great banquet with Jackson as the guest of honor. Toast after toast was proposed by Jackson's friends all lauding the philosophy of States rights, as outlined by Calhoun. Then Jackson was called upon for a toast. He stood up stretching his tall, gaunt, fever-stricken form to its full height—paused a moment—then uttered in ringing tones: "Gentlemen, our Federal Constitution, it must be preserved." Jackson left no doubt in anyone's mind as to where he stood on the Constitution.

Later, in 1858, came the Lincoln and Douglas series of debates in Illinois over slavery and States rights. Those debates led up to the Civil War, four dark and bloody years when American fought against American, brother fought against brother. The Civil War settled for all time the slavery question—but it did not settle the question of States rights. That question is still with us.

Mr. Speaker, the next great attack on our Constitution came in February 1937 when President Roosevelt sent his Court-packing proposal to the Hill for adoption. I was a new Member of Congress at that time having been sworn in only a month before. My oath of office was fresh in my mind, "To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States." President Roosevelt had lost patience with the "nine old men," who wouldn't go along with his welfare theories, whose decisions went against his social welfare programs. So in order to get a Court that would go along with his social and economic theories, a Court that would approve his social-welfare programs, he sent to Congress a proposal to pack the Supreme Court with men whose social, economic, and political beliefs were akin to his own—men who would carry out his wishes. If that proposal had been adopted it would have changed this country into a one-man dictatorship.

Fortunately, the people back home became aroused as they had never been aroused before. Congress was flooded with protests, and the Court-packing proposal was defeated. Then F. D. R. started to stack the Court, by appointing to every vacancy that developed among the "nine old men" a person who had the same social, political, and economic beliefs that he had himself, making the appointments regardless of that person's legal background or the amount of his judicial experience. President Truman followed in Roosevelt's footsteps when making his appointments to the Supreme Court; and Eisenhower finished the stacking process when he appointed Earl Warren as Chief Justice, a man with no judicial experience, and with a minimum of legal training.

We have today, therefore, a Court that bases its decisions upon the personal, social, political, and economic predilections of the majority of the Justices—not upon legal precedents; not upon constitutional grounds, as was anticipated by the makers of the Constitution; but upon the personal opinions of the majority of its members.

In the minds of our Supreme Court Justices today our Federal Constitution is a dead letter. It is largely ignored or flouted as a basis for present-day decisions. Even former decisions of the Court, under such great men as Charles Evans Hughes and Chief Justice Howard Taft, are ignored, disregarded, cast aside, in favor of socialistic doctrines expounded by a Swedish Socialist.

Mr. Speaker, judging by many of its recent decisions the majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court today actually believe their chief function is not to judge the laws passed by the Congress, to weigh them from the standpoint of the Constitution, but rather "to rewrite the Constitution in their own image," as Judge Alfred J. Schweppe, former dean of the University of Washington Law School, so aptly put it. In order to accomplish that objective they ignore or flout the precedents laid down by former great Courts; they ignore the amending process found in article V of the Constitution itself—saying the amending process is too slow and cumbersome. So they proceed by majority decisions to rewrite the Constitution according to their own preconceived social, economic, and political concepts.

For example, the Warren Supreme Court, in its 1954 decision on integration in the public schools, deliberately flouted or ignored a former Supreme Court decision delivered in 1896, giving approval to "separate but equal school facilities and services for white and colored pupils," a decision that had been the supreme law of the land for 58 years.

They also flouted or ignored a decision rendered by the Supreme Court in 1927 in the Gong Lum School case in Mississippi, where both questions, "equal protection under the law," and "separate, but equal school facilities" had been raised and argued. That Supreme Court, composed of Chief Justice Taft, and Justices Holmes, Brandeis, Stone, Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, Butler, and Sanford—all appointed on the basis of their wide judicial and legal backgrounds—rendered a unanimous opinion upon both questions in favor of the segregated schools provided by the constitution of the State of Mississippi.

Chief Justice Taft, in writing the unanimous opinion of the Court, said:

> Were this a new question it would call for very full argument and consideration, but we think it is the same question which has been decided many times to be within the constitutional powers of the State legislature to settle, without intervention of the Federal courts under the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, disregarding these decisions or precedents by former Supreme Courts, made up of men with great legal ability and experience, the Warren Court today brazenly reverses those decisions, not upon Constitutional grounds, but upon their own preconceived concepts of social and economic justice, citing as their authority for doing so the opinion of a Swedish Socialist, Gunnar Myrdal, as expressed in one of his books. In its 1954 decision on school segregation the Court did not say that "separate, but equal school facilities" was bad law. In effect what the Court did say was that separate but equal school facilities was bad sociology and bad psychology. Ross Valentine, one of our great American columnists, states the question before us today in these words:

> The great issue before the American people is the eventual control of our schools, our lives, and our economy, by Government monopoly concentrated in the hands of an unchecked court-of-no-appeal sitting as a legislature.

To what low legal estate has our Supreme Court fallen. How can our citizens respect present-day decisions of that Court?

Mr. Speaker, this Nation faces a great crisis today, a danger from within much greater than any danger that threatens from without. The words of Abraham Lincoln apply to the situation we face today as they never have before. These are Lincoln's words, spoken in 1837, when he was a member of the Illinois State Legislature:

> At what point shall we expect the approach of danger? By what means shall we fortify against it? Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step across the ocean and crush us at a blow?
> Never. All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not, by force, take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge, in a trial of a thousand years.
> At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, if it ever reaches us, it must spring up among us. It cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of free men, we must live through all time, or die by suicide.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the danger has sprung up among us—in our Supreme Court—and we must do something about it.

Mr. Speaker, the first great national crisis our people ever faced was the Revolutionary War. Thomas Paine in describing that situation said:

> These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from his duty; but he that stands it now deserves the love and praise of men and women.

The people of this Nation and the Members of this Congress face another great national crisis. Our Constitution, our sacred Charter, is being threatened from within as it has never been threatened before, threatened by men who have sworn to uphold and defend that Constitution. I pray God that we as Members of this 86th Congress will not be summer soldiers and sunshine patriots, but will stand firm in the defense of that Constitution, and thus earn the love and praise of men and women.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest and appreciation to the learned and very able address which the gentleman from Illinois has just delivered. I agree with the gentleman that we are facing one of the gravest crises that our country has faced since 1776. The Supreme Court of the United States has within the last 20 years been following a pattern of usurping legislative authority which it does not possess. The gentleman has referred specifically to the 1954 school cases. He could have just as well pointed to a long string of cases decided by that Court favoring Communist activities in this country, particularly the Steve Nelson case, which went up from Pennsylvania. They have followed that same pattern in any number of cases, and among them being the Watkins case, the Schware case, the case in which some 14 Communists had their cases reversed; the case involving the Subversive Activity Control Board which reached the Supreme Court after some 7 years of effort. That was the case in which the Board decided the Communist Party of the United States was a subversive organization, and that finding was set aside and the case sent back on a flimsy pretext. The Mallory case is another example of that pattern. There could be dozens of cases cited in which that Court has usurped legislative authority which it does not possess.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious that a judicial dictatorship can be just as destructive of liberty as Nazi dictatorship, a Communist dictatorship, or any other kind of dictatorship. The gentleman from Illinois has rendered a great service in delivering the speech which he has just made, and I, for one, want to express my deep appreciation to him for it.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. JOHANSEN. I should like to commend the gentleman from Illinois for his very able presentation. I should like to add that no Member of this House can gainsay for one moment the devotion of the gentleman from Illinois to the Constitution of the United States. May I ask the gentleman this question: May I ask whether he does not believe that it would be the supreme irony and the supreme tragedy of American history if, under the guise of creating alleged social rights, we were to so centralize government, so nullify the 10th amendment and so weaken the responsibilities and authority of the States under the Constitution as, for example, in the matter of education, that the security of all liberties, including those guaranteed by the Constitution, would be in jeopardy? Would that not be the supreme irony and the supreme tragedy?

Mr. MASON. It would. That is exactly what is happening, in my opinion.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues in commending the gentleman for his penetrating analysis. As I listened to the gentleman I was struck by a thought on the Supreme Court paralleling his own. The other body in a study of many recent Supreme Court decisions called "the suppressed report" concluded by observing that the net result of these decisions was to destroy the American people's will to resist communism. Coincidentally, destroying the peoples' will to resist is the Communist line against the United States. Mr. Mikoyan exemplified this effort as he visited our people and now speaks for them as though they were opposed to their Government. The new-found peace offensive is to lull us into a sense of complacency and false security.

I am wondering if there is not in the gentleman's mind something to this thought that the Supreme Court decisions coincidentally are weakening our will to resist the Communist menace?

Mr. MASON. It is bound to have that effect, in my opinion. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I want to compliment the gentleman on his very fine statement. I am so sorry that we hear so few dissertations in this body on the Constitution of the United States.

When I came here nearly 30 years ago we had some very profound constitutional lawyers in the Congress, and they spoke upon the Constitution from time to time. Always when they did there would be a good attendance on the floor, the Members listening with thoughtful attention. I wish that such speeches as the gentleman has made could be made more often. We should be reminded of the foundation of our Government, which lies in the Constitution.

My own State of Virginia is today in a state of disturbance that has never existed since the Civil War. Our Constitution, as we regard it, has been amended by the Supreme Court. I do not want to make any extravagant criticism of the Supreme Court, but I may say that the document issued in recent months by the Association of Supreme Court Justices of the States is a document that ought to be read and studied and prayerfully considered by every American citizen. It is not caustic. It is logical, and supported by legal authority.

On the integration question, in which we from the Southern States are in such a woeful minority, I am afraid that some of my colleagues from other States do not properly realize that that question raised by the subject of segregation is not the real question that confronts the American people today. That decision is a mere symptom of the disease under which this Nation is suffering by reason of the lapse in the consideration of the Constitution, which does not specifically present a final court of appeal on amendments to the Constitution, except through most cumbersome methods. So that while we are disturbed about the segregation question in the Southern States, the rest of the country ought to be disturbed about what could happen in their areas by a continuation of this policy of the Supreme Court amending the Constitution to suit their views.

What has happened in the South can happen in California, New York, or some other State, or upon some other pretext or some other question. So we ought here in this body to try to suppress our feelings and our political views on this subject and consider the most serious and most fundamental question of, Where do we go from here?

When the Supreme Court reverses a constitutional provision that has been the law of the land for 60 years, and when the President of the United States and Congress itself entertains the same feeling—I may say a majority of them—when the President of the United States says that whatever the Supreme Court of the United States says is the law of the land—not what the Congress says, but what the Supreme Court says is the law of the land—and when the Supreme Court announces the law of the land it then becomes the duty of the President of the United States to enforce it with the Armed Forces of this country. Now, stop, pause, and consider that for a moment; and I ask you again: Where does it lead you? Down what disastrous path does it lead? When the Supreme Court announces the law of the land, irrespective of the view of the Congress, and when the President says it is the law of the land and must be enforced by the troops of the United States, I ask this serious question of men from every State in this Union: When that occurs do you not have as powerful, as potent, as dangerous a dictatorship in this country as exists in any foreign nation we so constantly hear about?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my distinguished senior, and I am constrained to get to my feet to say one or two words.

During the period quite recently when I was in the Justice Department of the United States, in the executive branch of the Government, I argued several cases before the Supreme Court of the United States on constitutional issues.

One of those cases I lost, the Jencks case, which had to do with the opening of the files of the FBI.

I do not necessarily agree with the opinion of the Court in that case inasmuch as I think the opinion was painted too broadly, and I agree on the whole with the legislation thereafter passed to clarify this whole area. On the other hand, I will defend as long as I have voice in my body the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in every area involving the personal rights and liberties of our people, including cases in the area of internal security. I would oppose any effort made to cut down the jurisdiction of the Court when there is a disagreement because of the result in one particular case or cases.

In my view, history will show, and historians will write, that this Supreme Court is one of the great courts of our history. In my view, also, the President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower, in his appointments to the Supreme Court of the United States has conformed with and met the highest standards of the legal profession in this country, and has done a service to the country as a whole.

I subscribe to the theory that the Constitution of the United States is a living and growing document. Therefore I should like to say that much as I respect the remarks of my distinguished senior, I am constrained to disagree with him.

Mr. GARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MASON. He does not have the floor. I control the time.

Mr. GARY. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. MASON. I would like to answer him myself.

I grant the gentleman the right to have his own opinion of the Supreme Court and of its decisions and, of course, the gentleman's right to interpret the Constitution as a growing and an elastic thing that can be stretched by men with little or no judicial experience. The facts prove that, because I have delved into the background of these men. If any political appointment was ever made to the Supreme Court it was the appointment, in my opinion, of Warren as Chief Justice.

I do not deny any person, a Member of this House or anyone else, the right to have their own opinions or their own judgments and to have the right to express them under the Constitution of the United States. I have been giving you my opinion and my judgment—and it is not a snap judgment.

Mr. Speaker, I have spent some thirty-odd years on this Supreme Court and what it is doing, the trend it has followed, and the trend of its decisions in the last 20 years has undoubtedly been, in my opinion, a trend to the left to make our Constitution so elastic that that Court even quotes as a basis for its opinion a Swedish Socialist. That is a very mild term to apply to this gentleman because he has been quoted many times as a Communist and as a sympathizer of the Communists. We have that in our own records, so I am being rather moderate when I say "a Swedish Socialist."

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALFORD. Does the gentleman from Illinois know that there is definite evidence that subversive activities is at the base or at the root of our school problems in the South?

Mr. MASON. I have read that. I would not say that I have evidence that would stand up in court on that question, but I am inclined to believe that is one of the factors.

Mr. ALFORD. I shall be prepared in the future to say more on that. May I call attention to the fact that there is evidence that there are individuals in the country today who are more interested in creating mass agitation, setting one social group against another, than they are in the welfare of a minority. Also, I would like to go on record as approving all of the remarks that the gentleman has just made here today. May I ask, is it the gentleman's opinion that the present Supreme Court, the Warren-dominated Supreme Court, is in fact a third body of the Legislature and has usurped the power of this distinguished body?

Mr. MASON. I think that was the essence of my statement. Instead of doing what the Constitution and what our forefathers thought the Supreme Court would do, it is now legislating in the place of the Congress. That was never supposed to be one of its functions.

Mr. ALFORD. I was in complete agreement with the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI], the other day relative to Mr. Mikoyan. I think it is definitely significant that we should become more concerned about the welfare of Mikoyan when he is in our country than we are about loyal Americans today who are sincere in their desire to work out these problems for the good of all America.

Mr. MASON. I agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

A BETTER WAY TO FIGHT THE COMMUNIST CONSPIRACY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOGGS). Under previous order of the House the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, approximately 10 days ago four members of the House Un-American Activities Committee, including the chairman, spoke in opposition to my resolution, House Resolution No. 53, providing for a shift in jurisdiction of the Un-American Activities Committee to the Committee on the Judiciary. Today I shall discuss the subject "A Better Way to Fight the Communist Conspiracy."

May I, at this time particularly, thank Messrs. DOYLE and JACKSON for their recognition of my right to fight for a principle without implying any evil motives on my part.

I do not, of course, intend to reply to my colleague, Mr. SCHERER, of Ohio, who specifically did exactly that in direct violation of the rules of this House.

My colleague is an intelligent, vigorous opponent and certainly not a fool, but the old Biblical inscription, "Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him," shall be my basic guide today.

I am further encouraged by events, to which I shall shortly refer, to find that my opponents, despite their protestations, show signs of recognizing that we must face, in the light of the Supreme Court ruling in Watkins against the United States, our responsibility to do something constructive about the Un-American Activities Committee as it is now constituted.

It is ironical indeed that, while I have been attacked for introducing a resolution which allegedly would make any House investigation impossible, I have been attacked on the other hand because I specifically have not attempted to limit the duty and the obligation as well as the right of the Congress to investigate, and, in particular, expressed my high esteem for at least two members of the committee—Congressman WALTER and Congressman WILLIS.

I quote from I. F. Stone's Weekly of January 19, 1959, the contents of which, I suppose, will tend to characterize this weekly amongst those not approved by some member of the House Un-American Activities Committee.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I ask unanimous consent to include the entire article, which is rather long, so I will not read all of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, is this the I. F. Stone—whose name, incidentally, is Isadore Feinstein—who has been sponsoring various movements against the Committee on Un-American Activities and who has, I might add, publicly the worst front record of anybody that I know of?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I do not know whether this is the same gentleman. I only know that this is an article published by him taking me to task, so I presume that perhaps it is the same person.

Mr. WALTER. I think the gentleman ought to be very proud of the fact that he is taking him to task, and I am sure that all of the members of the Committee on Un-American Activities, all of whom know this man, I. F. Stone, are very proud of the fact that he is attacking the committee.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Then obviously we both, the committee and myself, are in the same boat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

THE NEW MOVE TO ABOLISH THE UN-AMERICAN COMMITTEE

No nation speaks more than ours about freedom and cares less. The day the President delivered his state of the Union message, Congressman JAMES ROOSEVELT, Democrat, of California, called a press conference to launch a resolution to abolish the House Un-American Activities Committee. Mr. Eisenhower in his address included one of those standard invocations of "the concepts of freedom, justice, and human dignity" we claim to defend but the real measure of our devotion was in the turnout 2 hours earlier at the Roosevelt press conference. Though the House committee has for two decades used the public pillory and the blacklist to undermine "freedom, justice, and human dignity," only seven reporters showed up.

BACKTRACKING BEFORE HE STARTED

The low state of freedom in America was also evident in the character of its champion. In a speech to the House last May 22, Mr. ROOSEVELT supported the Supreme Court's critical view of the Un-American Activities Committee. In the advance text of a new speech given out at his press conference, he had begun to backtrack. He was making "no direct or implied criticism" of the committee. He was merely saying that in view of the Watkins decision undercutting the right to harass people for something as vague as un-American activities, he thought a new committee ought to take over. He suggested House Judiciary and that its powers be expanded by adding seditious activity to its authority. He topped this off by pointing out that on the Judiciary Committee "we will have the experience of two present members of the Committee on Un-American Activities to guide its work—the chairman, Mr. WALTER, and Mr.WILLIS, of Louisiana." This is high recommendation indeed.

MERELY CLEANING THE DRAGON'S TEETH

When Mr. ROOSEVELT delivered the speech in the House last Monday he added two new sections which further blurred his course. One defined "seditious activity." When the vagueness of the term and the danger of a Seditious Activities Investigating Committee were brought up at press conference, Mr. ROOSEVELT said he would define the phrase as did the Supreme Court in the California Smith Act cases, i.e., as requiring some evidence of incitement to act. In the speech as delivered, he made no such reference but used as definition "attempts made by meeting or speeches or by publications to disturb the tranquillity of the state," though "wanting an overt act." This is tailor made for a continued witch hunt. Our St. George is telling the dragon that he merely wants to clean and sharpen its teeth.

St. George not only truckled to the dragon but cast aspersions on the virtue of the maiden to be rescued. The day Mr. ROOSEVELT held his press conference, Chairman WALTER rose on the House floor to attack a group including Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt which had placed an ad in the Washington Post calling for abolition of the committee. Mr. Walter attacked this as Communist inspired and singled out such signers as Prof. Alexander Meiklejohn, Clarence Pickett, Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, and Justine Wise Polier for a spurious political smearing. Far from defending them, Mr. ROOSEVELT added a section to his speech as delivered in which he said, "there is no doubt in my mind" that "a fringe" of the groups working for abolition of the House committee "have been Communist dominated or Communist inspired." He said he wanted to make it unequivocally clear that his resolution has no relevance to this abolition campaign but was designed simply to carve out of the recent legal decisions a constitutionally permissible area for congressional investigation of seditious activity.

WAITING FOR THE BARENBLATT DECISION

Chairman WALTER in an unusually mild reply to Mr. ROOSEVELT suggested that the House wait until the Barenblatt decision which is expected any day now from the Supreme Court. The anxious strategy of the witch hunters was indicated in the reply to Mr. ROOSEVELT by GORDON H. SCHERER, the Ohio Republican who is probably the wildest member of the House committee. Mr. SCHERER talked hysterically about "2,000 potential saboteurs in defense plants today" and paid Congressman CELLER the high compliment of saying that Mr. ROOSEVELT's resolution would hand the committee's work over to a committee (Judiciary) whose chairman (CELLER) was "to say the least, totally unsympathetic" with the Un-American Activities Committee. But Mr. SCHERER ended by admitting that if "the gentleman from California is correct" and the Barenblatt contempt decision proves as unfavorable as Watkins, the House would have to "change the language of the charter" of the Un-American Committee.

Mr. ROOSEVELT's resolution could then be used to extend the witch hunt it was supposed to abolish. It could go on as a Seditious Activities Investigating Committee. Mr. ROOSEVELT said he was not wedded to the idea of giving the new powers to House Judiciary. This would be as alien to the first amendment but it might be years before the Supreme Court got around to saying so. The only virtue of the Roosevelt resolution is that it could be the vehicle for public hearings before the Rules Committee. Now that battle has been joined, though in this slippery way, it behooves everyone to bestir themselves to arouse opinion, to demand that their Congressmen press for a public hearing, and to urge plainly the abolition and end of the American inquisition.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I wish to remind my colleagues that my resolution was introduced with the explicit understanding that I am not committed to my proposal as the only way to deal with the language in Watkins against United States. And I say again to my colleagues on the House Un-American Activities Committee that I appreciate the fact that they may prefer to wait for the decision in the Barenblatt case before the problem is evaluated. However, I state without equivocation, that such an evaluation has become a constitutional responsibility of the House. I feel strongly that if the leadership and if the Republican caucus do not like or approve my approach to the problem, this does not excuse them or any one of us from facing the seriousness of our duty.

It is particularly gratifying to me to note that at least one of the members of the House Un-American Activities Committees in the person of my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE]—without waiting for the Barenblatt decision—has already come forward with a resolution as he did in the previous Congress. He has suggested two things in his House Resolution 110: first, the change of the name of the committee to the Committee on Subversive Activities. Obviously this suggestion implies that there is a need to change the present name of the committee, and although Mr. DOYLE has not given his reasons for this, I think that any analysis of recent history concerning the activities of this committee will fully explain it and I am, of course, in complete agreement with him. Secondly, Mr. DOYLE proposes to rewrite the mandate of the committee as spelled out in rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives. The changes which he suggests are rather complete, sweeping, and again imply a recognition of the fact that the present mandate is thoroughly unsatisfactory. In all candor I cannot accept his mandate as being satisfactory; neither will it be accepted, I feel sure, by many of his colleagues on his committee, as well as others outside of the committee.

In an effort to be constructive on this matter, I shall, I believe, be prepared, when Mr. DOYLE's resolution or my resolution is given its day in its hearing before the Rules Committee, or before the House, to suggest alternate mandates aimed at overcoming the legitimate objections which have been raised, without impairing the legitimate activity of Congress to investigate.

Along with the rest of my colleagues I am most grateful to the Members of the House Un-American Activities Committee for reminding us of the threat communism poses to our way of life.

Likewise, I am certain they would equally appreciate my reminding them that if victory in the desperate fight against Communist tyranny is to be achieved, we must constantly examine our approach in this fight—coolly and objectively. Objectivity, so essential to our fight, can never be gained if any proposal for a change, such as the one embodied in my resolution, is automatically considered to be pro-Communist.

Free men, in the words of Tennyson, need to be "straight, but lissome as a hazel wand." Our very brittleness can lead us down the path to defeat.

My opponents indeed should be reminded that rigidity in their approach to the investigation of communism could even play into the hands of the Communists.

We came dangerously close to this point, I believe, when the committee issued, in 1957, a report entitled "Staff Consultation With Gen. Charles A. Willoughby." General Willoughby was a former Chief of Army Intelligence under General MacArthur.

In his testimony, General Willoughby appeared to equate with Communist expansion the natural hope for independence on the part of native Indonesians.

I am going to insert a letter not written by an editorial writer of the Daily Worker, nor distributed by any Communist-front organization. It was written by the former editor of the now defunct Washington Times Herald, the newspaper published, as we all remember, by the late Colonel McCormick, of Chicago, and later by another member of his family.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put the full text of the letter in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to call to the attention of the gentleman from California the fact that the writer of this letter, Frank C. Waldrop, is associated with Joseph Borkin, suite 802 in the Ring Building, who is a foreign agent representative of the Indonesian Government. This is Mr. Sukarno's representative and according to the registration under the foreign agents' registration section of the Department of Justice, received $5,616.99. That being the fact, I certainly think that anything Mr. Waldrop would write in criticism of that very distinguished general ought to be scrutinized very carefully.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I would simply say to the gentleman, I am perfectly willing to let the matter rest upon the letter. I trust the gentleman is not inferring that Mr. Sukarno, or the Government of Indonesia, is communistic. Do I understand that the gentleman will withdraw his objection, and that it may be inserted?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Then, Mr. Speaker, rather than reading it, I think it would be eminently proper, as the chairman suggested, and certainly in context with what he has stated that the letter be read in full and judged on its merits:

UN-AMERICAN MISCHIEF IN INDONESIA

(Letter by Frank Waldrop)

I have just finished trying to read a document entitled "International Communism (Communist Designs on Indonesia and the Pacific Frontier)," published December 16, 1957, by the House Committee on Un-American Activities as a staff consultation with Gen. Charles A. Willoughby, the former Chief of Army Intelligence in the Far Eastern Command under General MacArthur.

General Willoughby proves without any doubt that Communists have designs on Indonesia and that Communists exist in Indonesia and have influence there. This astonishing discovery equals in news value and importance the truth that Communists have designs on the United States, that Communists exist here and have influence here.

Sometimes, indeed, when I reflect on my nearly 30 years of intensive effort to understand communism and its unique methods of operation, I am almost persuaded that it has built as one of the most effective engines the House Committee on Un-American Activities, with which I have spent so many futile hours of effort and vain hope that it would learn its business.

What excuse, in God's name, has any committee of Congress for spending the taxpayers' money on such indefensible drivel as this compound of Willoughby's? By what test can the committee justify issuing this staff consultation as if it were a thing of value and discovery?

As it happens, I know something about Indonesia myself, especially as it is today by comparison with what it wanted to be when it became an independent nation. My first knowledge of what was brewing out there came in the winter of 1942–43, when Mr. Van Mook, the Governor General of the late Netherlands East Indies, undertook to educate us here in Washington about the Netherlands' plan for reformed colonial government in the Indies after the war.

The situation at the time was that the Japanese had just thrown the Dutch out of the Orient in violent style, and apparently without much difficulty. Then any Dutch in the Indies were doing their best to look small and avoid anything to remind either Japanese or the people of the region of their presence.

The American performance in the Philippines was not much, perhaps, as a military demonstration against the Japanese; but as a character test for the men and women on Bataan it hadn't done anything to destroy us with the people of the region, and our prewar commitment to work for Philippine independence was both believable and believed, then and thereafter.

But here was Van Mook running around Washington, while the Japanese were chasing Dutchmen through the woods of the Guineas, with a grandiose plan for elevating the natives from their former low estate to some kind of equality within the Netherland Empire, once the war was over, of course, and all had returned to normal.

I was once invited to the Netherlands Embassy (not since, I may add), to hear the plan presented and to offer comments. All I asked, and in those days I had little notion of the situation in the Orient as it was and was to become—all I asked was what we were supposed to do if the little brown brothers didn't like being little brown brothers, but instead just wanted to be people on their own.

Before the evening was over, I was well established as a low fellow who had no understanding of the real problem out there.

The actuality of politics in all of Asia in 1942 was plain as day. Need I spell it out? I can do no better than General Willoughby's chief, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, in his superb address to Congress after he came home in supposed disgrace as a casualty, after many years of high honor and great public service, to the ineptitudes of President Truman.

MacArthur's speech to Congress is all anybody needs to aline himself with the facts of life and politics in all the Pacific regions. The central point is that the people of Asia have aims and hopes and aspirations to live the modern life. They have become national in their attitudes. They have shown themselves determined to make their own mistakes, rather than go on taking the blows that come from the mistakes of others.

Certainly it is true that Indonesia, today, is having ghastly troubles making its way in the world. Certainly it is true that the Communists will destroy Indonesia if they can. But the question is whether the Indonesians will be able to survive the problems of emergency from centuries of blight at the hands of colonial imperialism. Do we want the Indonesians to survive or do we want them to fail?

If we want them to fail we can continue puffing up such peculiar thoughts as those which seem to obsess Willoughby, namely, that calling Indonesian leaders hard names will make them go away. We can also occupy ourselves with refusing to give ear to Indonesian friends who try to tell us their difficulties and their hopes. We can refuse them the respect and friendly consideration that one grown man offers and expects in his dealings with others who grow up, too, and have done so.

Such a policy of negation and fretful childishness has already cost us much in the Middle East. Now are we to cost ourselves remnants of friendship in the Pacific region, such as we have?

Just which side is this Willoughby working for, anyhow? And I may ask the same of this nonsensical committee which has, indeed, at last established itself as clearly the true Committee on Un-American Activities. The joke is feeble and tired—damned tired—I will admit, and I wish it didn't fit. But it does.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that such a report—referred to above—issued by the House Un-American Activities Committee is precisely what delights the Communists. Above all else in the struggle for the friendship of uncommitted peoples in the world, they would like to have us depicted as opposing any movement of the underdeveloped nations for independence.

The committee report accomplished precisely this. Mr. SCHERER's quotation from the Communist leader, Georgi Dimitrov, characterizes appropriately the committee report:

> The union leader who is outside our ranks but defends Soviet international policy is worth more than a thousand party members.

To call the report pro-Communist, however, is as dangerous, I must confess, as the suggestion that my resolution is pro-Communist. Such a technique has stifled, time and time again, a critical discussion of how to deal with the Communist problem when it was suggested that certain changes may be necessary.

In the same sense, we should not characterize the political behavior of Republican isolationists as pro-Communist when they fought lend-lease in 1940, at a time when the American Communists took a similar position.

I would not characterize the speeches of former Senator George W. Malone as pro-Communist when he attacked American aid to France for buttressing its imperialist activities in Indochina, although the former Senator's position was exactly the same as the then Communist Party line.

If my resolution, or Mr. DOYLE'S, or others which may be advanced, has substantive merit, then it is worthy of serious attention, regardless of what certain public or private groups may say.

In introducing my resolution, I did not think it relevant to consider the merit, or lack thereof, of the House Un-American Activities Committee's work. I considered it sufficient to rest the case for my resolution on the Supreme Court decision.

However, my opponents on the committee have made the committee's work an issue. I am, therefore, compelled to make these observations.

I am not impressed with the ceremonial pattern of the committee's work in subpenaing people who were former Communists, after having learned their names from the testimony of friendly witnesses. This has now gone on for years and years. Millions of dollars have been appropriated, specifically $2,982,000, or roughly $3 million for its operation from the 79th through the 85th Congresses, during which the House Un-American Activities Committee has been a standing committee.

Does this activity really help in the fight against communism? Does subjecting persons to intense publicity alone help us understand the machinations of the Kremlin?

By conducting this ceremony through the breadth and width of this land, we have achieved one unfortunate result. Former Communists and true repentants do not feel that there is a place for them in a free society, unless they are willing to name publicly those who were their former associates—a desperate decision for any man to make. They have been subjected to loss of their jobs, their status in the community and their very peace of mind.

Some of my colleagues may remember that only eight of us in the House voted against the contempt proceedings of one of America's greatest playwrights, Arthur Miller. Mr. Miller was subsequently exonerated by the Federal court and his case has not been appealed. Obviously our thoughts at that time were, what good did it do to the free world to subject this talented man, regardless of his past political attitudes, to a criminal prosecution because he refused to name those in the Communist Party with whom he had been associated 10 years ago? There is no question of the harm that it did to our status as the leader of the free world.

By what stretch of the imagination can anyone consider the committee's activity as anti-Communist when it released testimony in 1953, delivered in executive session, of a former chief of the American Communist Party from 1919 to 1929, naming Rabbis Judah Magnes, and Stephen S. Wise as well as Rev. John Haynes Holmes as following Communist Party instructions 30 years before the date he testified. Both Rabbi Magnes and Rabbi Wise were dead at the time of the testimony.

Rabbi Magnes left the United States and emigrated to Israel in 1922, settling permanently in that country. By 1925 he became chancellor of the Hebrew University in Palestine.

Yet the committee permitted Gitlow to make these charges without requiring him to substantiate them with the slightest evidence. Gitlow was not questioned at all about this reference to Rabbi Wise or Rabbi Magnes. He was not asked how he knew about the alleged Communist collaboration, whether it was based on his personal knowledge or hearsay or when the collaboration took place.

Later, in a Peekskill newspaper, Gitlow wrote in part:

> It was the purpose of this testimony to show how the Communist movement, from its very inception—though antireligious and in principel atheistic—was able to attract a number of well-meaning, liberal, and social-minded religious leaders such as Rabbis Magnes and Wise. The charge was not made that they were ever Communists or members of the Communist Party.

Had the committee shown the slightest responsibility of fair play, it would have refused to countenance this denunciation, on the unsupported assertion of one witness, based on nebulous charges 30 years old. Instead, heedless of the injury it might do to the reputation of two dead rabbis, and a living and respected leader of the Christian church, it made Gitlow's testimony public.

The national board of the National Council of Churches of Christ, the central body of American Protestantism, condemned the "utter disregard of the American tradition of fair play" in releasing accusations against the two dead rabbis "revered not only by their coreligionists but millions of other Americans," and described the committee's action as "yet another example of the abuse of the congressional investigative process."

Is there a single Member of this body who today would rise and defend the smearing of Rabbis Magnes and Wise or the Reverend John Haynes Holmes of having any connection with the Communist Party or its aims. Similarly, is there any Member of this body who would say that the National Council of the Churches of Christ is Communist dominated or a party line organization?

There has also come to my attention from the Frederick Press an article which I shall not belabor, but merely offer so that it may be judged by my colleagues. The article is as follows:

REDS GETTING PENTAGON SECRETS

Richard Arens, former director of the Internal Security Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate and now director of the House Un-American Activities Investigating Committee, tells, in a personal experience, one of the most shocking facts concerning the power of the Communist apparatus within our country, which is working every minute of the day and night to bring about our downfall. Several months ago he was invited to address the Reserve Air Force Association in the Pentagon at Washington.

"In order to get into the assembly hall," he relates, "I had to go through a series of rather amusing (to me at least) security checks. Finally I wound up with one of those identification tabs on me and was escorted into the room under armed guard to make my little talk. I was chiding them a little bit, and I said to them: 'You know, while I'm talking to you now in this Pentagon Building the tie lines and lease lines out of this building and the North Atlantic cable carrying confidential military messages are serviced by Communist agents.' "

WOULDN'T BELIEVE THE TRUTH

"And they wouldn't believe it. I said, 'I can prove it to you, not from what I say but from public records.' " What did I mean by that? Well, several years ago we had a series of hearings on the American Communications Association which is controlled lock, stock, and barrel by the Communist Party—penetrated, honeycombed with Communists. And we had them identified by live witnesses under oath. And, of course, in the face of that testimony they invoked the first and fifth amendments.

We had witnesses tell the committee that while they were in the American Communications Association as Communists, before they broke from the party, they were processing the lines out of the Pentagon—that they had intercepted Pentagon messages. We called before us Mr. Brucker, Secretary of the Army, and we said, "How about this?" And here are his words quoted: "Nothing short of deplorable, potential disastrous results. Unless this legislation is enacted (a bill then before Congress) we are not in a position to insure the Congress and the American people that all reasonable measures are being taken to safeguard our national security."

NEWS SUPPRESSED

Secretary Brucker was talking at the time about a bill that had been introduced to invest the military with the right to disassociate Communist saboteurs from vital defense facilities. How many American citizens ever heard about this bill. How many have ever heard about this public testimony of Brucker? It didn't see the light of day. But I can show you that it was public testimony. Mr. Brucker testified: "We know and can identify an estimated 2,000 saboteurs in our Defense Establishments."

We asked him, "Aren't the real top secret messages that go out over these tie-lines and lease lines and the North Atlantic cable—aren't they in code?" He said, "Yes; but that's the way you break a code; by getting repeated messages." And he said, "In addition to that, there are a great number of messages going over these tie lines and lease lines and the North Atlantic cable (from the Pentagon) which are less than secret but which are classified, which we do not want made available to the enemy."

REDS INFLUENCE LEGISLATION

That was 4 years ago. Now what happened to that bill? Surely the bill would become law promptly so that the military and the Justice Department could disassociate the Communist saboteurs from the tie lines and lease lines and defense facilities. Well, the Communist conspiracy got into operation. I was on the Hill. I saw the mail coming in. (Communists can have on Capitol Hill within 72 hours, 50,000 letters on any subject.) I saw their people walking the corridors. Did the bill pass the Congress? No. Did it pass the Judiciary Committee of the House? No. Did it pass the subcommittee handling the bill in the Senate? No. And today, as a sequel, the tie lines and lease lines and North Atlantic cable now running out of the Pentagon are still serviced by people under the control of the American Communications Association. We could identify, call by name, address and location the Communist saboteurs that are in the organization.

This is a shocking report. What can be done? The citizens can reach and correct this terrible situation only through their representatives in Congress and the White House. A flood of letters would get some action. Will we write them?

It would be pertinent to ask these specific questions: If what the Director of the House Committee on Un-American Activities says is true, what has been done by the committee or the executive branch to specifically apprehend these people who would be obviously violating the law, and what has been done to notify individual Congressmen of the names of those who are walking the corridors of Capitol Hill?

I believe it is of the greatest importance that if, as the gentleman says, he can identify, call by name, address and location, the Communist saboteurs that are in the organization—that he and the committee have the clear duty of so identifying them. If not, this kind of article becomes a scare article and harmful to our country.

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHERER. Do I understand from the gentleman's remarks that he is denying what Mr. Arens says is true about Communists working on cables and tie lines?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. The gentleman, if he had listened to what I was saying, would have learned that I do not deny anything. I said if you have the names, if the committee can identify the people and if you have not made them public you have not done the job which you are bound to perform.

Mr. SCHERER. There is going to be introduced into the record of this House the names of individuals. Has the gentleman asked for the testimony before he made this speech?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I have just asked that this be done.

Mr. SCHERER. Has the gentleman asked the committee for their testimony now in its files?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. A colleague of mine asked and he was unable to get it from the committee. I presume if he could not get it certainly I could not get it.

I personally know of at least one Member of the House who has heard from his constituents concerning this alleged shocking condition and who, up to this time, has not received proper answers to the questions raised from either the committee or the Secretary of the Army to whom he wrote for an explanation.

On June 11, 1956, the House Un-American Activities Committee issued a statement on the Fund for the Republic, an organization whose funds stem from the Henry Ford family, scarcely to be challenged as communistically inclined, in which it questioned whether its vast resources were not being used to weaken our security structure in the Communist cold war.

Later, the committee held public hearings on two scattered aspects of the fund's activities, without according the fund or any of its representatives, its directors, or its officers the right to be heard or according them the right to cross-examine hostile witnesses called to testify against the fund.

Let me tell my colleagues that this action was taken against a private organization which distributed thousands of copies of a pamphlet issued by the Department of Defense entitled "Know Your Communist Enemy."

This action was taken against an organization which made a $250,000 grant to study the influence of communism in American life.

In September of 1956 the Fund for the Republic issued a pamphlet attacking the Communist Party's maneuvering in their national convention held in that year.

Is this hit and run action of the committee against the fund the kind of anti-Communist activity for which the taxpayers are paying millions of dollars, in the hope that it is doing the work of free men? The concern for this kind of action by the House Un-American Activities Committee is attested by an editorial from a newspaper owned by John S. Knight, never to my knowledge accused of party line activities, published on January 17, 5 days after my first address to the House on this subject:

[From the Detroit Free Press]

NOTHING NEW HAS BEEN ADDED

The House committee that deals with un-American activities warns of a dangerous tendency to underestimate Red spying.

The existence of that peril is doubtful. By now, after all the familiarization that's been made available, it appears most improbable that anyone in this country who ever is going to understand the grim espionage facts does not by now comprehend them fully.

Their warning is of a piece with all the un-American activities committeemen have come up with for a very long time. They burden the Government Printing Office with exposés of the long-since exposed and consume their time with testimony of the twice-chewed cabbage variety.

Possibly there is still work for the committee to do, and if so it ought to be kept in business. However, if its job is done (and there is no sign that it is not so far as committee operations are concerned) then it ought to be disbanded.

It costs a lot of money to keep it going, and your Uncle Sam always seems to be short of money needed to do things of an appreciably greater present usefulness.

And similarly the respected St. Louis Post Dispatch on January 23, 1959, editorialized as follows:

REGULATE, CURTAIL, OR ABOLISH

The movement to abolish the House Un-American Activities Committee is growing. Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT has introduced a resolution to close out the committee and transfer its jurisdiction to the House Judiciary Committee.

On a national scale a group of prominent citizens, including clergymen, writers, and scholars, whose patriotism is not to be questioned, has taken the same stand. Among these signers are Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Reinhold Niebuhr, and Stringfellow Barr.

In proposing to abolish the committee, Representative ROOSEVELT comes head on against the proposal of Representative WALTER, of Pennsylvania, to expand the work of the committee and to give it more funds to work with.

The Walter plan is to drop the old controversial name and to enlarge the area of the committee to cover internal security, nationality, and migration. The committee that Mr. WALTER envisions would be one of the most powerful in either branch of Congress.

Really the important thing is not whether the committee is abolished or kept intact or curtailed or seemingly enlarged. What is important is that in whatever provision the House makes for inquiries into these sensitive fields proper safeguards shall be established. Better no committee than one such as ran virtually wild in the days of Martin Dies and J. Parnell Thomas. And if there is to be investigation in the fields listed above then let it be by fair rules and procedure.

Fortunately the House has an eminent guide. It is the Supreme Court's decision in Watkins against the U.S. (1957) in which Chief Justice Warren found the committee statement of authority was so broad and confused as to be no clear delegation of power at all. Saying flatly that "no inquiry is an end in itself," but "must be related to and in furtherance of a legitimate task of Congress," the Chief Justice and his colleagues ruled:

"There is no general authority to expose the private affairs of individuals. * * * Investigations conducted solely for the personal aggrandizement of the investigators or to punish those investigated are indefensible."

If the House will enforce the Watkins decision, well and good. If not, the Un-American Activities group will be clearly illegal and useless, and should be abolished.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I have prepared an analysis of the rather sweeping claims to legislative accomplishment made by the staff and some of the members of this committee. I believe that it is worthy of consideration by my colleagues.

In June 1958 the House Un-American Activities Committee published a report entitled "Legislative Recommendations by the House Committee on Un-American Activities; Subsequent Action Taken by Congress or Executive Agencies." The foreword states that the report "summarizes every legislative recommendation offered by this committee from 1941 to 1958."

The report contains 79 recommendations—taking into account identical recommendations made in more than one session of Congress is actually 45. Subsequent legislative or executive action that was impliedly taken on the basis of the committee's recommendations is listed beneath each recommendation. Of the 79 recommendations, relevant legislation was adopted in 35 instances. In addition, making adjustment for duplication, 31 bills were proposed upon which Congress failed to act. The report states that as of July 1958, 26 of these bills were still pending before Congress.

Analysis of the 35 recommendations adopted by Congress shows that 30 of them were included in 6 statutes: The Internal Security Act of 1950; the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952; the Immunity Act of 1954; the Espionage and Sabotage Act of 1954; the Communist Control Act of 1954—amending the Internal Security Act of 1950; and the act of August 1, 1956, providing for the registration of individuals trained in foreign espionage schools. The other five acts concern either the statute of limitations of, or penalties for various criminal offenses. All were reported out of the Judiciary Committee.

Of these six acts, only two were referred to the House Un-American Activities Committee: The Internal Security Act of 1950, and the Communist Control Act of 1954. The other four were acted upon by the Judiciary Committee. The two acts account for only 14 of the recommendations submitted by the House Un-American Activities Committee. Of the 14 recommendations, 5 were contained in the Internal Security Act of 1950, and subsequently were repealed and made part of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. It is interesting to note that these 5 recommendations, which concern the entry and deportation of alien subversives, were not included in the House version of the Internal Security Act of 1950—House Report No. 2980, August 22, 1950—but rather were proposed in the Senate—Senate Report No. 2369, August 17, 1950.

The sponsorship of the 31 bills listed in the report as having been proposed but not adopted warrants further research, as does their disposition. Also, what relationship is there between the committee's recommendations and the 10 instances of executive action purported to have been taken as a result of the committee's work.

It is not unreasonable, I think, to suspect that the connection between the recommendations and subsequent action is more coincidental than real. Corroboration is necessary and will be available.

The fact remains, however, that the only legislation with respect to which it can be said with confidence that the House Un-American Activities Committee was directly responsible, is the Internal Security Act of 1950 and the 1954 amendments thereto. Note that only that part of the Communist Control Act which amends the Internal Security Act to include Communist infiltrated organizations is attributable to the House Un-American Activities Committee. That part of the Communist Control Act outlawing the Communist Party was proposed in the Senate and adopted without committee hearings in either House. Indeed, for what it is worth, the House

Un-American Activities Committee's report on the Internal Security Act of 1950 expressly stated its objections to outlawing a specific organization—House Report No. 2980, August 22, 1950, page 5.

An ingenuous—if not ingenious—argument could be made, of course, that the slim work-product of the House Un-American Activities Committee is not a reflection of its wastefulness or inutility, but rather demonstrates that although the committee has succeeded in alerting the Nation to the menace of subversion, its keen regard for constitutional principles has made it reluctant to urge the adoption of legislation that would encroach upon civil liberties. The fact, however, that the committee is anxious to take credit for repressive legislation that is not even its own, successfully demonstrates the folly of that argument.

Substantively, the Internal Security Act and its 1954 amendments is open to serious constitutional objections. Perhaps the most persuasive objection is that made by the present chairman to the 1954 amendment. Speaking of this Communist-infiltrated section of the 1954 bill, Mr. WALTER said:

> It seems dangerous to us to report a far reaching bill which may, as the Wall Street Journal pointed out, "chip away at the very rights we seek to save from that [Communist] menace."

That is in House Report No. 2651, dated August 9, 1954. It is a minority report signed by the chairman of the committee and I believe my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. DOYLE], and one other.

I am sure Mr. WALTER has not lost his basically sound beliefs and I trust they will lead him to join Mr. DOYLE, myself, and others in a constructive solution to the present dilemma.

As on January 12, Mr. Speaker, I must again emphasize that my sincere and complete effort in this matter is to bring before this House the urgent need for taking inventory of the Un-American Activities Committee and assessing the best approach to bring it into line with the indicated directive of the Supreme Court of the United States and in line with the mandate of a host of Americans, loyal to their country, but also dedicated to the principle that the fight against the conspiracy of communism or any other subversive or seditious activities should not contribute in any manner to the destruction of the basic individual rights of American citizens. This is the essential difference between totalitarian or communist philosophy and practice and our own and other democratic processes. It is possible, and we must find the way to protect our freedom, our liberties, as well as our existence as a nation from Communist assault. Interminable postponement is impossible. Constructive achievement is possible and is a challenge to the Republicans, Democrats, and to the leadership of this House.

CUBA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALBERT). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker and colleagues and ladies and gentlemen of the House, a week ago Thursday I told you I was going to Cuba to learn firsthand the facts of the result of the 26th of July success, and that I would come back here and tell you truthfully what I have observed. At that time I was going at my own expense, but on the Saturday following Senor Quintana, president of the Cuban Press Association, invited the American press and some Members of this Congress so when I arrived the Government reimbursed me for my expenses and I was their guest. I stayed at the beautiful new, modern Havana Riviera Hotel. Our colleague, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER], arrived a few days later and spent 3 days while I was there.

Mr. Speaker, I would like first to give you a few of the background incidents which have not come out in the press. On Friday of last week, I was a guest of the Council of Churches of Cuba at the University Methodist Church of Havana. About 35 Protestant clergymen were present. About one-fourth of those Protestant clergy are American citizens. Nearly all of them were educated in America and were members of the underground movement of the 26th of July movement. They were so aroused concerning the attitude of the American people and the American press that spontaneously without any word from me, even before I spoke, they voted to send preaching missions to the United States beginning this coming Sunday. The first mission to arrive will be composed of three Protestant clergymen to preach in the pulpits of America and to tell the truth as men of God, as they have seen the truth, through the days of Batista and during these days of Dr. Fidel Castro. I would like to point out that during the 18 years of the dictator Batista, he never had in his armed forces one single Catholic or Protestant chaplain. I received this information from both Roman Catholic priests, Protestant clergymen, and leaders of the Government. Dr. Castro has had chaplains with him all the way from the very beginning and even some of the priests were actually participating side by side with men of the 26th of July movement. There is complete loyalty and dedication of the people to the new regime. Going through the streets of Havana, Dr. Castro rides without any protection. The people impose upon themselves a tremendous self-discipline.

One million people poured out last Wednesday to hear him speak. Not a single incident; not a single person did I observe who had been drinking. I cannot picture a crowd of a million people in the United States without some kind of an incident happening.

Police and soldiers are serving today without pay in Cuba. The Boy Scouts are in charge of all traffic. There had been only one case of thievery in the city of Havana, with a population of a million and a half people, as of the day I left there, Saturday, January 24.

One of the things that the Department of State conveyed to me before I left was the moving in of Communists into the vacuum of the trade union movement. After the success of Dr. Castro's revolution 18 men were elected to the board of directors of the trade union. Five were known Communists. I conveyed this information to the Department of State and to leaders of the government in Cuba. I am happy to say that the board of directors was dissolved on Wednesday, and a new board of nine members appointed, and each Communist was put out of office by Dr. Castro.

Something was brought to my attention by the leaders of the Cuban Government which I think should be investigated. They all said that former Ambassador Earl T. Smith was anti-Batista until a deal was made in connection with a nickel mine. When this deal was made, so they say, then our Ambassador became pro-Batista. Whether it is true or not, I do not know. What it implies, I do not know, but I most definitely recommend that the proper committee should go into this situation and clear it up, because it is causing further anti-American feeling.

What kind of a man is Castro? First, he is a wealthy man. He comes from a family of the upper class in the Oriente Province. He is well educated. He has a doctor's degree in law.

These are some of the quotations that I jotted down as I was with him there, and heard him speak to me and to others:

> One single execution of an innocent man would destroy the entire 26th of July movement.

Another one:

> We will renegotiate all contracts and concessions with the United States and other foreign governments. We will void those that are onerous to our government.
> I call on the people of the Dominican Republic, and other tyranny-ridden lands to revolt.

All of the members of the Latin American press were there. They supported this declaration of his. They asked him whether he would lead such a revolt, and he said, "Definitely not." The Governments of Costa Rica and of Venezuela supplied Dr. Castro with arms. Brigades of men from all over Latin America, Puerto Rico, and America fought in the revolution. Because those countries did supply Dr. Castro with equipment and ammunition we should be realistic and realize that the Cuban Government will supply those people who rise up to overthrow dictators. Undoubtedly they will receive men to help them from other Latin American countries.

Another quotation:

> People who attack me never attacked Batista and are not now attacking Trujillo. Why? My political philosophy is full democratic rights for Cuba just as you have in the United States.
> From now on the United States must understand that military men in power are very easy to destroy. We will never be in any Communist orbit, and if any attack is made against us we believe that the United States will help us because we are not Communists.

Finally he said:

I renounce any ambition for power or for money. I need neither, but I am not the master of my destiny.

In talking to people in the streets, to soldiers, it is my opinion that Dr. Castro may be drafted by his own armed forces to take over the leadership of Cuba. He does not want it. He said:

I am tired. I have not read in 2 years. I would like to rest and read.

Then he said, "I am not the master of my destiny."

Now, as regards the trials we have heard so much about. In the first place, I announced as soon as I arrived that I would not attend any of the public trials because I did not believe my presence there would be of any value to the Government of Cuba or to myself; it would lend my presence to something that would weaken Dr. Castro, would do him no good. Furthermore, I was against the spectacle of the trials, so I did not go.

I was with Dr. Castro during the trials for almost 2 hours. I think he realized it was a grave mistake to have held the trials in a public arena. As you know, the next day he canceled the trials in the arena and also the television. He wanted to do this, as he told me, because he wanted the world and his countrymen to see that these trials were conducted fairly.

In order to understand these trials in Cuba it is necessary for us to understand certain differences. Justice in our country is based upon Anglo-Saxon common law in a land of peace, while their justice is based on the Latin American philosophy of the Roman law where for 18 years they have undergone torture totaling 20,000 casualties and where they are only now emerging from under the bloody shadow of Batista. The trials have been publicly backed by the Roman Catholic bishops of Cuba, the leaders of the Protestant churches of Cuba and even, in the language of Time magazine, not an overly sympathetic organ, overwhelming public opinion.

The philosophy of Cuba and of the Latin Americans is something similar to the Mosaic law of the Old Testament: "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," only they have a saying: "Dos males hacen un bien"—two wrongs make a right. This is the opposite of our philosophy.

First of all I want to say that the list of those to stand trial was not hastily prepared. The enemies of the Cuban people were known and a card index file was kept of them. That is why Dr. Castro can estimate that 400 out of the 2,000 they arrested would be executed.

Second, they have furnished the right of defense counsel, which Batista denied. They have also given defense counsel the right to discuss the case with the accused, which they did not have before. They are open to the press of the country, and they have a free press in Cuba. We have good newspapermen covering the trials. The trials have been open to the people, which Batista did not allow. Furthermore, the accused has the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, which never existed for him under Batista.

The worst situation was in Santiago where 127 people were tried. Here out of 127 who were tried during the first days after the crisis, 47 were acquitted, 10 received prison terms, the balance were executed.

Now, I conclude by saying a few words concerning the future of the United States in Latin America. The future of the United States in Latin America pivots on Dr. Fidel Castro.

You must realize that here is a man who is considered as a messiah not only in Cuba but also in all Latin America. Our future in Latin America pivots on our relationship with Dr. Castro. It is touch and go, make or break, from here on in.

First. I would suggest a crash program of aid. Dr. Castro says they want no long-term aid, because Cuba is a very wealthy country and once the corruption which existed under Batista ceases, the Government will be able to finance itself very well. Batista took out all the money he could lay his hands on. He took every single penny out of the Cuban treasury. Recently, however, they broke open several deposit boxes which Batista did not have a chance to get to and have recovered some $20 million.

Second. I believe we should have a moratorium on speechmaking on both sides, Cuba and the United States, beginning with me today. Let us give Castro a chance.

Third. We must stop doing military business with dictators by furnishing them with arms and military missions. The newspapermen from Latin America were unanimous in saying that they would do everything possible to drive out the American military missions from their countries.

Fourth. We have to resolve within ourselves our own philosophy on foreign policy. I pose a question without a suitable answer: How can we advocate a philosophy of nonintervention in Latin American affairs while we do intervene with instruments of death and with men who teach the know-how through our assistance pacts and our military missions?

Fifth. We should investigate the pro-Batista lobby now operating in the United States, and see who are the forces in back of this and how much money Batista and his former friends may be spending to attempt to buy American public opinion.

At the earliest possible opportunity our President should invite to our country the very able and dignified Dr. Urrutia, the President of Cuba and the members of his cabinet. Dr. Castro has also expressed a desire that he would like to come to the United States.

Lastly, and this is a grave matter that goes beyond Cuba. I was told reliably by the top leaders of the movement, that they spent $25 million. Most of these arms were purchased in Chicago, New York and Los Angeles. I saw them. Some were brand new. Also the vast majority were second-hand. I saw quotations on arms, from .22 caliber bullets to tanks and armored jeeps for sale to anyone who had the cash to buy them. I think an immediate investigation should be made of the manufacture, sale, distribution and transportation of arms in the United States. If there were agencies in the United States who could arm Castro at their price and he could upset a dictator, what is going to prevent Communists from getting arms and upsetting a democracy? What is to prevent organizations which dwell on the lunatic fringe of our own land from obtaining arms?

May I say that the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. PORTER], did a service by coming to Cuba and I have welcomed his support. I will do everything to assist him in his efforts against Trujillo.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MONAGAN. I would like to ask what the gentleman's opinion is as to the time element before the situation will simmer down?

Mr. POWELL. I do not have any information with regard to the time element. The Cubans were 18 years under Batista and now, going on only 4 weeks, under a democracy. It is hard to state how long it will take. They have promised democratic elections in 18 months. Herbert Matthews, who did one of the best reporting jobs, in his objective opinion as a newspaperman, said it will take 18 months before they are ready. In the meantime, there is a marvelous effort at self-imposed discipline by these people. For instance, I do not think that soldiers will be off the streets until they are able to recruit a new police force, because the old police force was totally pro-Batista. They hated that police force more than any other group.

I was with the commander in chief of the armed forces—Camile Cienfuegos—and he told me they would start recruiting a regular army from the 26th-of-July Movement and the Second Front Veterans sometime soon. As soon as the army men start disappearing from the streets and go into the regular army and they start building up a new police force, I feel that your question is one very difficult to answer. In the meantime, I cannot answer it.

Let me say that it is a wonderful place for any tourist to go. There is now complete protection. There is nothing to worry about. It is not the Havana that we used to know. The American gangsters and criminals have been driven out by Dr. Castro, and crime is at its very lowest. But it offers an opportunity to be in a very charming place, with wonderful hotels, and to be sitting in a ringside seat with a background of history.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. The gentleman spoke of a moratorium on speeches. Is it not a fact that only a very few Members of the Congress have made any speeches or public statements of any kind on this matter?

Mr. POWELL. The gentleman is exactly correct. The number could be counted on both our hands, but unfortunately it is a sore thumb that always sticks out. I would like to say that there are Members of this body here who have not received any attention in the press, who indicated in writing very fine sentiments and support of Dr. Castro. Some of those letters came before I left. Dr. Castro asked me about them. One was from our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA], who fought when he was 16 years of age in the war for the independence of Cuba. He wrote a very warm letter. And, Members from the other body did likewise, but they did not receive the publicity, unfortunately. And, we are being judged today, again unfortunately, by a handful rather than a vast majority of the over 500 Members of this Congress.

JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make the following announcement:

Pursuant to the provisions of title 15, United States Code, 1024(a), the Chair appoints as members of the Joint Economic Committee the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. PATMAN, of Texas; Mr. BOLLING, of Missouri; Mr. BOGGS, of Louisiana; Mr. REUSS, of Wisconsin; Mr. CURTIS, of Missouri; Mr. KILBURN, of New York; and Mr. WIDNALL, of New Jersey.

AREA REDEVELOPMENT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride and high hopes that I introduce herewith the area redevelopment bill for appropriate reference.

This is a bill aimed primarily at creating a much needed point 4 program for America.

This is not a handout bill. It is not a giveaway bill. Its philosophy and purpose are to bring about increased productivity, provide needed jobs for millions in chronically depressed areas, rebuild healthy economies in many regions of the country, and revive hope and decent prospects for careers at home for the young people of those affected areas.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to help fight inflation and to bring to our national economic system and defense effort millions upon millions of potential manhours of production which are now being wasted because people ready, willing, and able to work have to sit it out on the sidelines in painful unemployment.

The administration is much concerned about inflation; well here is a weapon that can be utilized to help win that fight, the weapon of greater productivity; the Nation as a whole is concerned with our military posture, the state of readiness of our defense and military capacity in an era of pushbutton weaponry. In these times the Nation can illafford the loss of production that would accrue to our national wealth and strength if jobs were provided for all the willing workers available throughout the land.

The whole spirit of this bill is positive, creative, and is in the best tradition of American self-help.

Mr. Speaker, if the area redevelopment bill which the last Congress enacted had been signed into law last year and not subjected to the ill-starred and inglorious fate of a pocket veto, I say to you in all sincerity the economic health of America would be stronger than it is today.

The harsh fact of the matter is that despite the roseate reports from administration sources that things are getting better day by day, the economic picture is further clouded than it was last year when the area redevelopment bill was passed by the Congress.

We have only to compare reports of the Department of Labor over the past several years to realize how the need for this legislation has increased with the passing months. It is significant that in May 1956 a total of 23 major labor market areas had substantial unemployment, meaning 6 percent or more of the labor force was jobless, and 65 smaller labor market areas in 23 States were classified labor surplus. By comparison, the reports of the Department of Labor for 19858 reveal that 80 major labor market areas, in 25 States, had 6 or more percent of their labor force unemployed, and 188 smaller labor market areas, located in 35 States, also had over 6 percent unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, I am including with my statement, and I request that it be printed as part of it, a recent tabulation of the area expansion committee which details the regions of the country which are classified as distressed areas.

Mr. Speaker, let us make no mistake about it, today the free world is engaged in all-out competition of production with the Communist combine. With ominous regularity, the Kremlin, and the Red Chinese, and the subservient governments of the Communist satellite states, announce 5-year plans and 7-year plans, the latest this very day. The entire populations of those nations are yoked to the effort of increasing production, bolstering economic strength, stepping up total output. On all sides, the Communists are chanting "Beat America, Beat America." Hardly a day or an edition goes by but Khrushchev can be found boasting that communism is riding the wave of the future, accelerating its production totals, achieving new and greater goals, presaging the day, in his view, when communism will literally bury, in his prediction, the United States and the other democracies.

In the face of such a strenuous challenge then, how in the name of heaven can we abide a situation which year after year finds many communities and regions of our country virtually "withering away" economically? This Nation has need of the gainful employment efforts of every last one of our ablebodied workers. It is a tragic waste and a dangerous loss to allow these battalions of displaced workers to languish in enforced idleness. Not only does such human and economic waste seriously shortchange the Nation's strength but the neglect of the problem is productive of deteriorating morale in vast numbers of our people, accounting for broken homes, disruptive social influences, breeding economic sores that affect the whole body economic of the Nation.

The problem has long been recognized. The administration itself has taken official cognizance of it. The President in messages to three sessions of the Congress has made acknowledgment of it and promised to take steps to cure it. Regrettably, the bill passed in the last session was smothered to death by a pocket veto.

That bill was a good bill and deserving of better fate. The bill I am presently introducing is a better bill, in my judgment. It is the counterpart of the bill being introduced in the other body today by Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, for himself and 34 other Members of both parties. This fact in itself signalizes the wide-base, bipartisan support the measure commands in the upper body, and augurs well for its ultimate enactment into law.

Some of the improvements in this present bill, as compared with the area redevelopment bill passed by the Congress last year, include:

First. An independent administration is created to provide an authority to carry out this comprehensive program—section 3.

Second. An agricultural representative is added to the Public Advisory Board that the problems of agricultural areas may be brought more squarely into a careful administration—section 4(c).

Third. The 300-county limitation on participating rural areas is removed—section 5(b).

Fourth. The loan period for industrial and rural loans is reduced from 40 to 30 years—section 6(a)(6).

Fifth. Criteria requiring that funds provided in the bill be used to provide more than temporary alleviation of unemployment or underemployment—section 6(a)(3).

Sixth. The interest rate to the borrower is increased to one-half of 1 percent with the additional one-quarter of 1 percent being specifically allocated to a sinking fund to cover possible losses incurred—section 6(b)(8).

Seventh. Authorization for grants for public facilities is limited to 1 year rather than for an indeterminate period—section 8(d).

Eighth. Vocational training provisions are tied to the employment opportunities created in the area, as are subsistence retraining benefits with a $10 million ceiling established for retraining benefits—sections 16(a), 16(b), 17(a).

These changes have been made in the bill as a result of information gained during hearings in both Houses of the Congress in the 85th Congress and from research and study. Proponents of the bill are of the opinion that the revisions have strengthened the legislation and made it a better bill.

Mr. Speaker, it would be a mistake to regard this bill as something to give a shot in the arm to the national economy, just in passing, as it were. It will, of course, create jobs, swell payrolls, boost purchasing power, infuse the legion of jobless with new hope, but primarily it is designed to bolster and restore those sick spots in our national economic picture that have been ailing for so long a time.

Many of those distressed communities have been making and are presently engaged in praiseworthy efforts to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps. In community after community business, industrial, labor, and civic leaders have banded together to beat back the adverse economic tide that has threatened to engulf them. In city after city, the people have emptied their pockets to create industrial promotion pools; the sacrificial giving in many places has been truly inspirational. The people have literally given until it hurts. But there is a limit to their resources, and in many places the bottom has been scraped, and the citizenry finds it needs outside assistance in their industrial recovery efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy and proud to say that I have the privilege to represent a district, the 11th of Pennsylvania, that affords an outstanding example of community effort to better the business, industrial and job situation. In Luzerne County we have an industrial development fund that has literally performed wonders. The people have responded most generously to appeal after appeal, and the results in new industries and payrolls have been most gratifying. Nevertheless, the situation can best be described as a case of where we have to run at top speed to keep even with ourselves. We bring in a new industry today, and tomorrow 500 miners lose their jobs because another anthracite coal colliery is closed down. This has created our problem, this attrition in the coal industry. Once it was the giant fuel, but over the years, what with one cause and another, its annual tonnage has taken a large drop and in our valley we have lost thousands of mine jobs, and this depressed condition of our basic industry in turn has had unfavorable affects on the whole industrial picture in our valley. Our people, as I say, are coping with this problem manfully, and we are getting results but the adverse tide is running heavily against us and we need help in the form of loans such as this bill provides.

Just for a moment allow me to refer to the mine flood disaster in my district. Last week as you know from the headlines, the raging waters of the Susquehanna River, fed by snows and heavy rains, smashed a hole in a mine outer wall and flooded large areas of mine workings. Unfortunately, up to this very moment, the fate of 12 entombed miners remains in doubt, and although physical factors are dimming their chances, our people, as always have recourse to prayer, and are sustained in their profound and impressive faith in divine providence.

While the rescue work goes feverishly on, already many forces are at work on the needed and urgent tasks of relief and rehabilitation. My people up there in the valley are not panicked and dismayed. They are a stouthearted people. They have lived with adversity for a long time, they have been companions to disaster over the years. They are now going about repairing things, so to speak, so as to build a more substantial future. Many of their resources have been smashed, but their spirit has not been broken. They have invested of their meager savings, and yes, of their substance in the past to better their economic situation and are going about doing the same thing again. But they need help, they need your help, they need the beneficient interest and constructive assistance of their government, and, they feel they are in no wise compromising their dignity or self-respect in urging their government to do a little for them, what it is doing in a greater degree for backward areas in other parts of the world.

The sort of enterprising spirit as prevails in the Wyoming Valley holds equally true in the upper coalfields where the people of Scranton and Lackawanna County have won national attention and applause for what they have done in the way of industrial rehabilitation. And so it goes around the country: American cities across the land, in all sections of this great Nation, have been going it alone as it were, trying their utmost to better their economic situations. It's high time they had from their Government more than repeated promises in this great undertaking; it's time their patience, their fortitude, their confidence, their self-sacrificing were rewarded with the enactment of an adequate area rehabilitation of the scope and dimension that will do the needed job, a bill that will usher in a brighter day for so many of our fellow citizens.

On a former occasion I said:

> The mental gymnastics of political economists trying to balance the recession-recovery ball is poor fare to the more than 4,200,000 jobless Americans who can't eat "gaffed-up" statistics.

When I made that statement last October we were all being assured that the recession had been just a bad dream that had faded with summer's end and that henceforth all was going to be sunshine and sweetness. I wish to God, as I stand here today, that I could be a witness to the fact that unemployment had vanished before a new boon of business and industrial activity. I devoutly wish I could truly say today that there's not enough unemployment in America to make it even worth talking about. But the sad, challenging truth is that like last October, so, too, today we have more than 4 million unemployed, and that despite all the fervent wishing there's not much to sustain the prediction that the unemployment problem is about to leave us.

Mr. Speaker, there is just no good sense or sound public morality in this business of playing a waiting game in the hope the specter of unemployment will go away—instead of relying on the weak reed that next month's employment figures are going to show unprecedented gains and that somehow time is going to take care of the vexing and enduring challenge of joblessness, we, as a people and a Government, ought to face up to the problem—assume our moral obligations and tackle this problem in a positive way, on a broad, national scale.

The family without income finds scant nourishment and poor consolation in the products of propaganda which primarily consists of telling the American people that things are getting better and better in every way, every day. Such kind of thinking and acting is a poor substitute for the constructive national leadership which the times demand.

Let me, if I may, stress the fact that unemployment is costly in a variety of ways. Last year alone the Government paid out the staggering sum of $4 billion in unemployment compensation benefits. Think of it—$4 billion. It was a good thing, of course, that those who received these benefits had purchasing power in their hands; much better that than the conditions of former years when a man who was out of work was almost automatically broke. But think how much better it would have been for the national economy, for the body politic, for the individual recipients of unemployment compensation, for their families if the Government had made a wise investment in an area rehabilitation program and the idled workers had been able to get into good paying jobs of value-creating productiveness. Not only does joblessness account for large payments in workers' benefits, but at the same time the Treasury incurs severe income losses, for statistics inform us that every fully employed person in the country accounts for the sum of $560 annually in tax revenue. Again, casting up the balances, joblessness costs the public treasuries millions in direct relief, after unemployment benefits are exhausted, and the Nation is also the loser by the amount of goods and services that would have been added to the gross national product if the legions who are on the idle rolls were back at gainful jobs.

Anyway you look at it, chronic unemployment is a cancer on the body politic.

This bill I am introducing affords all of us, the administration as well as the Congress, an opportunity to demonstrate our faith in the people by authorizing a program of adequate loans to communities—urban, rural, and to Indian tribes on reservations. It will give people and the communities who have had a tough time of it over the years a chance to battle their way to recovery. I sincerely hope that in the consideration of this vital legislation we will have in mind that already in 1959 our Government has authorized loans to not less than a half dozen foreign governments totaling millions of dollars. I ask you, in simply justice, if we should not give our own people the same kind of a break. Really we are asking for very little in relation to the problem—very little in relation to the amount that is going to be asked of us later in this session for foreign aid. We have been given broad public hints that this Congress will be asked to appropriate upward of $5 billion for foreign aid. This bill I am now introducing is truly an American point 4 program. I earnestly commend it to your consideration and support. Let's give our fellow Americans a fair shake. In doing for them we will be doing for ourselves and for our country.

In the beginning I said I was speaking with high hopes. I am. I have every confidence that good sense and fairness and patriotism will prevail in this body and that the House will ratify this measure by an overwhelming majority, as I am sure the other body will. This Congress, I feel, has had a mandate from the people on this measure. Let us do our duty and translate the will of the people into this sound, much needed legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include the aforementioned journal.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield.

Mr. STRATTON. I desire to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Speaker, for his remarks and also for the bill which he has introduced. As I have already indicated, it is my desire to introduce a companion measure, because this meets a serious problem in the State which I represent, the State of New York. I do desire to express some concern with regard to the provision in the bill which is similar to the bill which passed in the last session of the Congress, which requires that an area which is listed as an area of substantial unemployment, that is, 6 percent, as the gentleman has said, is required under this bill to continue in that condition for 18 months, if I understand it correctly, before it is eligible for consideration under this legislation. In my judgment, this is an unduly long time, and, in fact, it forces in some cases a deterioration of a situation which, if it could be corrected more quickly by the benefits of the bill, might be prevented from getting more serious. I am referring particularly to certain established industrial areas, such as Schenectady, which I have the honor to represent. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he feels that perhaps the bill might be more helpful if this provision were amended to some extent in the bill that he has introduced.

Mr. FLOOD. May I say to the gentleman that this is not my brain child or that of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]. This bill is the result of 6 years of continued hard work. By the way, this is an entirely nonpartisan effort. My friends on the other side of the aisle have been just as active as my friends on this side of the aisle. I was chairman of a subcommittee last year when we steered this through the House. On that committee were 8 or 10 Republican Members, just as active as the Democrats. The same is true in the other body. We held hearings in a dozen States, in 40 or 50 communities, over a period of 4 years, taking testimony. From all those efforts, from all of those combined suggestions, from 2 years of hearings before committees before this body and the other body, from 2 years of hearings before the distinguished Committee on Banking and Currency in this body this is the synthesis, this is the best thinking of the leaders of America, of the people who suffer these hardships. They are bankers, labor leaders, and this is a composite of all that experience and all of that thinking. But let me say we are glad to have you here for more than one reason, and before long this bill will undoubtedly be referred to the distinguished Committee on Banking and Currency, and when hearings are held there I am sure they will be happy to have the gentleman from New York appear and give them the benefit of his suggestions, which I am sure he feels have some merit.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks and desire to join with him in introducing this legislation but perhaps making the change which I have indicated, which in line with his suggestion I would like to advance before the appropriate committee of this House.

Mr. FLOOD. This is no sacred cow. Good luck.

WEST GERMANY'E IMPORT TAX OF $4.76 PER TON ON UNITED STATES COAL IS FURTHER EVIDENCE THAT FOREIGN NATIONS WILL ACCEPT AMERICAN IMPORTS WHEN IT IS PRINCIPALLY TO THEIR ADVANTAGE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, last week, the West German Republic announced that effective February 16, 1959, a tax of $4.76 a ton will be levied on coal imported into that country. This tax will adversely affect the hard-hit coal industry of the United States and especially the normal export of 12 to 16 million tons of coal per year to Germany.

Frankly, the Nation's coal industry is about to receive another severe blow on the international trade front.

West Germany's arbitrary imposition of a prohibitive tariff on coal imports from the United States slams the door in the face of a salesman who has been able to deliver his product a distance of more than 3,000 miles and still charge less than producers within close proximity of this market.

This ability to put coal down in Europe at most attractive prices has been made possible through the dogged efforts of an industry that has refused to rest on its laurels as the world's most efficient coal producer. Although output per man-day in the United States is at least four times greater than that of any other country, coal management—with the approval and encouragement of the United Mine Workers of America—continues to invest in new methods and machines that are largely responsible for coal's price stability in a period when most commodities have spiraled upward at an alarming rate.

Mr. Speaker, let us consider the impact of this proposed tax levy on the coal industry which has been beset by economic distress for almost every one of the past 10 years.

Many mines in Pennsylvania have long since gone out of business. Others are holding on with 1 or 2 or 3 days a week of production—not enough to allow for normal owner earnings and certainly not enough to provide a respectable standard of living for workmen and their families.

Despite coal's economic ills, the industry has gone forward with its mechanization program. In some cases the necessary capital has been made possible because of firm contracts which the industry has been able to negotiate. Contracts to sell coal to West Germany were among those which some American companies utilized as a basis for attracting investment capital or for making necessary loans. The action of the Bonn government in placing a duty of $4.76 per ton on American coal entering West Germany amounts to a repudiation of such contracts, for obviously the tariff places an impenetrable cost barrier on U.S. coal.

The impact of West Germany's action will be felt not only among producers shipping overseas; much of the coal that would have been shipped across the Atlantic will, in seeking other outlets, bring further competition into domestic markets in a competitive struggle that the industry should not be expected to bear.

What has happened in Bonn is further evidence that foreign nations will accept American goods only when it is to their decided advantage to do so. In contrast, our State Department has insisted on continued decreases in our own tariff rates and has vehemently opposed quotas that would offer protection for the American coal miner against residual oil imports. The U.S. coal industry has thus been caught in the middle of an international tug of war. Our only recourse is for Congress to enact the legislation necessary to safeguard this vital industry and at the same time give our miners a chance to get back to work.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Legislation To Protect the Right of the Blind to Self-Expression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the National Federation of the Blind, I am introducing a bill intended for the protection of the rights and privileges of blind people, especially with regard to the right of self-expression. In order that blind people may be heard and given more opportunity to express their views with regard to matters that relate to them and to their Government, it becomes necessary they be assisted through representatives of organizations with which they are associated.

The bill is in two sections. Under the first section the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare would consult with authorized representatives of recognized independent organizations of blind people in formulating administrative programs to provide aid and rehabilitation to the blind. This section is also intended to recommend that State agencies formulate programs that will coincide and work with those provided under the Federal program.

Blind people are asking, among other things, that they be given a chance to present their views and their programs to agencies of Government that deal in particular with blind people. They claim that about the only way they can make themselves heard is to do it through recognized organizations that represent the blind.

Blind people of America want to be recognized as a part of our Government. They are interested in the management of its affairs. It is not just a question of providing funds for these people, but more especially a recognition that they can be of service to our country and be a part of the community by becoming self-supporting when afforded opportunity to do so. Providing funds is important, but not enough. The desire for emancipation from economic and social bondage must come from the people themselves. This desire is strong in the blind citizens of our country.

In 1940 a group of 15 or 20 blind men and women from 7 States met for the purpose of starting an organization which today has a membership of many thousands in 45 States. In our State we have the Kansas Association for the Blind. This association has won the admiration of the people of our State.

The Kansas association, along with other State organizations, is joined with the National Federation of the Blind. I am informed it is the only countrywide organization to which blind people belong. Members of the national federation seek and work toward improvement of their position in society. They expend their strength toward the attainment of a better and freer life for people who are blind. By their initiative and courage and by refusing to accept helplessness as their lot, these people have proven their claim that they be consulted on matters which affect the blind. They insist on their right to join organizations of their own choosing and that such organizations represent them in matters of particular interest to blind people.

Members of Congress, as well as people in general, have always been concerned with regard to our blind Americans. The American people will continue to see that the needs of the blind are properly protected. This is a problem of assisting people who want to help themselves. Blind people do not ask for charity. They ask for opportunity to permit them insofar as possible to make their own way.

This bill is intended, especially, to protect these handicapped people in their rights as American citizens and to afford greater opportunity whereby they may help themselves. They feel that under the terms of this proposed legislation they will be better fitted to cope with problems that apply in particular to blind people.

A Tribute to Hon. Herman Eberharter

OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of our dear friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, the Honorable Herman Eberharter, was a real loss to our State and the Nation. It was also a great personal loss to those of us who had the privilege of knowing and working with him here in the House.

His tireless efforts in behalf of more equitable tax legislation, social security legislation to improve the economic status of our old folks, and other liberal measures earned for him the respect and admiration of his colleagues.

Herman Eberharter was a keen, active, and able legislator who possessed great courage and vision to see beyond the immediate aspects of a particular problem. He was faithful to his duties, sincere, and upright in dealings with his colleagues. We shall miss him greatly in the days ahead.

Ormonde A. Kieb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. WALLHAUSER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to have this opportunity to pay tribute to a close personal friend who has recently resigned as Assistant Postmaster General, Ormonde A. Kieb.

Prior to assuming the very responsible office in the Post Office Department in February of 1953, he had been a very prominent realtor in Newark, N.J., had served as president of the New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards, as national president of the Institute of Real Estate Management, and was one of the organizers and a charter member of the Society of Industrial Realtors. He had been active in the National Association of Real Estate Boards, having served as national director and as chairman of the public relations committee.

It was, therefore, with a fine background of business experience and real knowledge that he undertook the difficult task of the management of the Bureau of Facilities of the Post Office Department, which has jurisdiction over the real property management program of the Department, as well as the procurement and distribution of all supplies, equipment, and vehicles; the maintenance of the motor vehicle fleet, and the communications and physical properties of the Department's civil defense planning. The Bureau formulates policies and programs governing procurement, management, maintenance, and disposal of all real property, all equipment, all vehicles and supplies used in the postal service.

He rendered distinguished service and effected measures that led to the modernization of his department, reduced costs, reduced delivery schedule time, and streamlined procedures.

He received the Award of Achievement for the year 1955 in recognition of his outstanding success in introducing many methods of efficiency and economy. In 1956 the Postmaster General presented him the Distinguished Service Award of the Post Office Department in recognition of outstanding accomplishments.

As he returns to his profession of real estate it is a great pleasure for me, who has known him for many years, to testify to his high character, zeal, and his ability and, on behalf of his many friends, to wish him the greatest possible success in his future endeavors.

A Salute to the 4–H Clubs and Their Leaders

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, on January 24 the Kentucky 4–H champions were named and it was with a great deal of pleasure that I learned that Joseph Wesley Sprague, 18, of Sturgis, Union County, Ky., had been selected as the champion in agriculture in the 1958 4–H Club achievement contest, while a young lady from another section of Kentucky took honors in home economics.

Joe W. Sprague is typical of the young men in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the honor to represent, who have consistently taken prize after prize in agricultural contests throughout the State. During the 9 years Joe has been a member of the 4–H Club he has undertaken projects in the following categories: Baby beef, labor service, electric, tractor, leadership, appearance and grooming. His baby-beef project has won him numerous blue ribbons and cash awards; and a profit of $3,175 earned from this project has been set aside for his college education. In addition to his 4–H Club work, Joe, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Sprague, takes a keen interest and an active part in various school and church affairs. He has a 12-year perfect attendance record at Sunday school.

While Joe Sprague is certainly to be commended for his outstanding achievements in agriculture, we must not forget or neglect the many dedicated people concerned with the development of our youth who make such achievements possible. We are indeed fortunate in having in the Second Congressional District a great many intelligent and energetic men and women who as 4–H Club leaders, argicultural teachers, county and home demonstration agents, and advisers to the Future Farmers of America and the Future Homemakers of America play such a vital part in inspiring, guiding, and instructing our youth in agricultural pursuits. When so many of our young people are leaving the land for the so-called glamour of the city, the selfless and untiring efforts of these persons in demonstrating the benefits to be gained from farming cannot be overestimated. It is to these leaders that we owe a deep sense of gratitude for having instilled in our young men and women an appreciation of the rewards and satisfaction to be achieved from a life devoted to farming, for as Thomas Jefferson said, "Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God."

Victory for America

OF

HON. CLINTON P. ANDERSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, last Saturday was a red letter day for the Democrats in New Mexico. They had a huge victory dinner at Albuquerque and were honored by having as their speaker the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Senator JOHNSON drew the largest crowd that has ever attended a political dinner in New Mexico. By actual count 1,105 people sat down in Albuquerque's huge civic auditorium to hear the majority leader. In addition, hundreds more were in the gallery to hear him.

They were not disappointed. The senior Senator from Texas was in rare form, not only in the formal address but in the friendly asides during the delivery of that address and in the stirring conclusion of his remarks.

I ask unanimous consent that his address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VICTORY FOR AMERICA

(Address by Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON at Democratic victory dinner, Albuquerque, N. Mex., January 24, 1959)

Mr. Chairman, fellow Democrats, it is a special pleasure, as a Texan, to be here in one of the few States that outlie Texas.

As you know, of course, Texas suffered a little embarrassment recently. We used to be the largest State in the Union. Then we were knocked over by an iceberg.

DOWN, BUT NOT OUT

We are down—but not out. That is why we sent a Texan out here to take over as your Governor.

You know Colorado used to have a Texan as Governor. Oregon had a Texan as Senator. The Nation has a Texan as President.

Unlike John Burroughs, of course, these others are Republicans and that is one of our chief exports in Texas. We don't mind when they leave—in fact, we encourage it. We don't usually let the good Democrats like Burroughs get away.

CHERISHED FRIENDS

A special pleasure for me is the opportunity to be in the home State of two of my most cherished friends, DENNIS CHAVEZ and CLINT ANDERSON.

The Nation is fortunate that you have sent them both to serve in Washington.

DENNIS CHAVEZ holds a vital role in our national life as chairman of the Committee on Public Works and the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations. I congratulate you on his reelection and, personally, I thank you for it.

I thank you also for CLINT ANDERSON. Several years ago, I asked a senior Senator to stand aside so that he might serve as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. At this session, he again assumes the important chairmanship of that committee—and the job could not be in more responsible hands.

TWO GREAT SENATORS

You have two great Senators. You have, also, two of the most able young Congressmen in Washington—my friends, JOE MONTOYA and TOM MORRIS. Keep your eye on these two. They are on their way to positions of high responsibility.

These victories—and many more—we have come to celebrate.

THE GREAT CRUSADE

We are meeting tonight in the lingering twilight of the great crusade.

The noble slogans are muted and still. The polished brass has tarnished and scuffed. The flying banners hang listlessly and limp.

It was just 6 years ago that all the world was young and gay.

The ship of state was destined for a firm hand at the tiller. Fiscal solvency was the polestar toward which our course was set.

We were to have strength without exercise; health without care; an assured future without investment.

THE THREAT OF VETO

And now there is nothing left but a desire for quiet—and government by the threat of veto.

Our country is torn by a great internal controversy.

Communism has declared economic war against our way of life.

The United States—which led the world into the atomic age—now lags in the exploration of outer space.

A BALANCED BUDGET

And we are told that there is just one issue before us—passage of an artificially balanced budget with a dot over every "i" and a cross through every "t."

The people gave their answer to that kind of government 3 months ago. They repudiated the concept of administration by inaction, procrastination, and delay.

All over the country—from Maine to California, from Minnesota to New Mexico—they cast their ballots for men of vigor. They asked for—and they shall receive—leadership in keeping with their own desires for progress.

WASHINGTON RUMORS

But the ink had scarcely dried on the headlines of victory when the rumors began to seep out of Washington. The informed sources and the reliable informants all told us the same thing.

The President was determined to exercise his veto powers to the hilt to check a wild spending spree.

There is no American who objects to the exercise of the veto power. It is a proper, constitutional function and one of the most important checks in our system of checks and balances.

WILD SPENDING

There are very few Americans who favor a wild spending spree by their Government. We all know that the end of such a spree would be fiscal insolvency.

But I think it is about time that somebody blows the whistle on threats to veto bills that have not been drafted and to cancel steps that have not been taken.

Perhaps I studied the science of government in an old-fashioned school that is now out of date. But I had always believed that the veto power was something that the President exercised after he had examined a bill.

It was only in Alice's Wonderland, I was told, that the rule was "verdict first, trial second."

And when the verdict is "veto," not only before the bill is passed but even before it is printed, it becomes little more than an instrument to blackjack Congress.

It is rather strange at this date to have the administration standing at the dike to hold back the tides of spending. It is just 6 years too late for the role to be natural.

ADMINISTRATION BUDGETS

The present administration has drawn up, and administered, the largest peacetime budgets in history. And the last Democratic Congress clipped $5,600 million off those budgets.

To set the present administration up as the guardian of the balanced budget is in the same class as hiring a coyote for a watchdog over the sheep.

The last Democratic Congress did not embark on any wild spending sprees. And there is certainly no reason for thinking that the present Congress will do so.

A CONGRESS OF ACTION

But there is every reason to believe that this Congress will be a Congress of action. And it is the concept of action that brings us to the heart of the matter.

There are two ways in which a nation—or a man—can remain fiscally solvent.

One is to pull in, cut down, retract, withdraw, scrimp, and shrink from activity.

The other is to expand, produce, work harder, be more efficient, welcome opportunities.

THE REAL ISSUE

The real issue before the United States today is which road we will follow.

Democrats believe the budget can be balanced if we take advantage of our opportunities to increase the wealth of the Nation.

Republicans believe the budget can be balanced if we turn our back on opportunities and resign ourselves to the status of a second-class nation—weak, but thrifty.

THE DEMOCRATIC TIDE

It is no accident that the Democratic tide, while rolling strong everywhere, reached high-water mark in the West. It is here in the West that men have the greatest vision of the meaning of opportunity.

We know, as westerners, that this whole vast region—from Texas to Montana and from the Mississippi to the Pacific—is one of the tomorrows of our Nation.

Your own State is a land of enchantment—not for the legends of its yesterdays but because of the lure of its tomorrows.

Here, all across the West, tomorrow is everything.

The same is true in all the regions of our young land.

We must make provision for the support of the population of the 1960's and 1970's. We must enlarge our productive capacity. We must multiply our job opportunities. Add more schools. Erect more hospitals. Build more roads. Construct more homes. Increase the output of our farms. Solve the problems of our human relations.

THE MUSTS—THE NECESSITIES

These are musts, no choices; necessities, not options.

Today's leadership will be adjudged responsible or irresponsible in terms of how tomorrow is served by the course we set now.

As a Nation, we stand at the very edge of the most demanding era of our economy's history. Yet, as we see the needs ahead, we find our cities blighted, whole regions depressed, key industries sick, vital links of our transportation system mortally ill.

ACCUMULATED DEFICITS

Search the history of the Nation and you will find few periods of the past in which so many accumulated deficits have pressed upon us—at one time—for action and resolution.

Yet, in the face of this, we are confronted by a deepening division in the directions of our national leadership.

On the one hand, the representatives of the people—most recently elected to serve them—say that the time has come to put tomorrow back into the mind and heart of government.

On the other hand, those who serve in the executive branch of the Government are serving notice that there is no room for tomorrow in their planning. And, furthermore, they go one step farther: the partisans of those with Executive power are openly threatening to use that power to veto tomorrow.

WORLD LEADERSHIP

We cannot expect to lead the world if we turn our backs on tomorrow. Yet, that is now offered as the chosen course of those with executive responsibilities.

They have turned their backs on New England.

They are silent to the needs of the northern manufacturing States.

They are totally insensitive to the economic potential of the South.

DISREGARD OF THE WEST

Most tragically, this administration has elected to disregard the West.

Let us look for a moment at your own State of New Mexico.

In less than 15 years, New Mexico has grown enormously—both in population, in manufacturing, and in importance. Much of this has come directly from the stimulus of an industry which did not exist 20 years ago—and barely existed 10 years ago.

I refer, of course, to your atomic industry.

Out of this one new industry has come a whole new world of opportunity for you and for your children. Because of it, whole new cities stand in your State where none stood a generation ago. Great new wealth is coming from your soil. New capital is being invested here. A new future is opening before you.

What has happened to New Mexico because of the atomic age is only a beginning—for in the space age opening before us now, this story will be repeated many times.

STORY OF THE NATION

It is—or it can be—the story of the West and of the Nation.

For the real impact and import of the space age will not come in the skies above us but in the West about us. Our scientists tell us that in the next decade our space technology will produce a flow of knowledge and understanding of materials which will revolutionize our industrial system.

Entire new industries will be brought into being.

New uses for unused resources will be found.

New metals and new metals technology will develop.

Every region in the Nation will benefit from this, but the Nation will especially need—in this era—the full capacity of its West.

THE WATER PROBLEM

Furthermore, you know and I know that the full solution of the water needs of the West is not going to be achieved piecemeal, nor is it going to be met by conventional efforts alone.

In my State, we have drawn plans to take the surplus water from regions with an abundance and channel it across great distances to supply regions with a deficit.

The feasibility is established.

The sole question is not the way—but the will.

I remember 20 years ago that when the survival of the free world was at stake the United States marshaled its resources into the Manhattan project—to unlock the secrets of the atom. Through such concentrated effort, we solved—in less than a decade—a challenge which many doubters thought could not be solved. And because of our effort, we opened for all of humankind a new age of hope which we are only now beginning to realize.

MANHATTAN PROJECT ON WATER

I express to you my belief that the time has come when we must cease our dawdling over the water problems of the West. It is time for us to commit our resources to another Manhattan project on water.

The solution of the water problem is far nearer than was the task to which the scientists at Los Alamos first addressed themselves.

We know, already, for example, that it is feasible to transform salt water into usable water for municipal, industrial and agricultural use.

At modest expenditure, we should be able—within 5 to 10 years—to perfect our methods sufficiently to make such water available at an economically feasible cost to the West.

PROBLEM CAN BE SOLVED

The point is this: the water problem of the West can be solved, insofar as engineering is concerned. The solution depends not upon the engineers but upon the decisions and courage of our political leadership.

Thus, the question is a question of political integrity—not technical capabilities.

I, for one, would express the hope that we may during this Congress lay before the executive branch this clearcut choice: hand to them a program for undertaking to find the solution to the water problem—then let them, with the eyes of the Nation upon them, make their choice.

Will they meet or will they fail the responsibility to tomorrow?

RESPONSIVE SERVICE

We of the Democratic Party have—for the past 6 years—served constructively in the Congress. We have not sought and we have not exercised a veto over progress—or even over Republican proposals that are in the interest of America. We have served responsibly and the elections demonstrate that the people approve.

Our sense of continuing responsibility does not permit us to follow blindly along a blind course—and this we shall not do.

DYNAMICS OF THE NATION

It is my belief—as I am sure it is yours—that the future of this Nation lies not in turning back to the past but in forging ahead to unlock the dynamics of our regions.

We do not propose to leave any region or any area or any city to stagnate amid the promises of these times.

We do propose to devote ourselves to the expansion and the growth and the confidence characteristic of America.

This is the spirit and the image of the Democratic Party.

By this approach, we shall make our victory of last November what it ought to be—and what we want it to be—a victory for the people of America and free men everywhere.

Hallelujah! The Small Tobacco Farmer Has Been Saved for One More Year

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to report the arrival of good news which will hearten everyone who is interested in seeing that people get a fair break in their efforts to make a living.

I was informed yesterday that the Department of Agriculture had abandoned a previous plan to cut burley tobacco quotas by 16 percent, and will keep the 1959 quotas at the present level for another year.

Mr. Speaker, this is a great break for the small tobacco farmers in West Virginia, and throughout the Burley Belt. In fact, it will mean the difference between their survival and the danger of bankruptcy and possible starvation.

A few days ago I made a strong appeal for the small tobacco farmer in testimony before the Tobacco Division of the Department of Agriculture. I pointed out that the small tobacco farmer could scarcely be held responsible for creating any surplus—if indeed there were a surplus. Had this punitive measure been put into effect, it would have been roughly comparable to court-martialing a lowly private for the war crimes of his general.

Most recent policies of the Agriculture Department have tended to favor the big farmer, and conversely, to hamper the small farmer. Millions of small farmers have been driven off their farms. A cut in tobacco quotas not only would have hampered our small tobacco farmers—in some cases it would have driven him out of business altogether.

When I appeared before the tobacco hearing, I paraphrased a famous old tobacco advertising slogan, saying I did not want "L.S./M.F.T." to come to mean "Let's starve mountaineer farmers of tobacco."

If I may paraphrase another tobacco slogan of more recent vintage, may I say that "They said it couldn't be done." But somehow, the Department of Agriculture was persuaded to change its mind and rescind this punitive decrease in allotments.

All of us interested in fairness and justice applaud the action taken, and we are truly thankful.

Pepe Figueres on the Cuban Trials

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, Jose (Pepe) Figueres, ex-President of Costa Rica, and one of the foremost Democrats in the hemisphere, comments on the Cuban trials in a letter which was published January 18 in the San Jose, Costa Rica, newspaper La Republica. It contains a point of view which is highly persuasive and which should be given more consideration in this country:

(Translated from the Spanish)

Sr. EDMOND WOODBRIDGE, San Jose.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: Thank you for your expressive telegram of January 16, which says:

"You are the most qualified to interpret the humanitarian sentiments of the Costa Rican people by suggesting the cessation of the summary executions in Cuba. In this manner, as Cuba yesterday thanked you for your support in the revolution, tomorrow it will thank you even more for having tried to prevent violence from sullying the magnificent democratic triumph. All of the combatants who made the War of Liberations of 1948 with you are today harvesting the fruits of the clemency and justice which you stipulated for the losers. This memory is your best credential to take before Fidel Castro the matter which I respectfully suggest to you."

With such noble concepts, friend Edmond, you put me in a difficult situation with myself. How agreeable it would be for me to agree with your thesis! And how painful it is for me to disagree!

It is curious how the same event (the summary executions in Cuba) and a same desire (that of guaranteeing democracy in America) can stir up diametrically opposed reactions in different persons.

I am going to make public a letter I sent to Fidel Castro recently, before learning of the requests in various congresses of America asking suspension of the executions, and before knowing that the Legislative Assembly of Costa Rica, on the other hand, had turned down, by great majority, a motion aimed at sending the same request for clemency to Fidel Castro.

I have learned that the North American association, ADA, has addressed you asking clemency for the Cuban war criminals.

The ADA is a very estimable liberal group. Many of its members are friends of mind. They are the ideological allies of the Latin American democrats. And the petition which they make to you could not be better intentioned, nor more authorized.

This petition, in my judgment, complicates even more the rough matter of sanctions, in which it is so difficult to decide with certainty. It has its pros and its cons, of short and of long term.

I consider it a duty of other Americans to share with you this prodigious responsibility, at the risk of also committing an error. For this reason I dare to offer you this unsolicited opinion, in a matter that seems to be Cuban, but is American.

In my country capital punishment does not exist, nor has the necessity for it been felt in this century, fortunately. But each society and each historical moment has its own necessities of survival, which are wont to be the least of various bad possibilities. In Cuba's present circumstances, which I know well, severity can be a lesser evil and impunity.

Disgracefully in our America today, to be a democrat you have to risk life. This will not end until it is universally understood that you have to risk your life to be a hired assassin.

Yours respectfully,

JOSE FIGUERES.

Permit me to repeat the idea contained in the last paragraph of this letter to Fidel Castro, because it expresses my conviction, very sad, very lamentable, but one which I should not hide: so long as in several countries of our America it is necessary to risk one's life to fight for freedom, and so long as there is not the unquestionable certainty that to be an instrument of tyranny also means that you have to risk everything, there will be no end to the temptation on the part of big-time adventurers to seize power and on the part of irresponsible citizens to back the seizure and to benefit from it by torturing their fellow countrymen.

There is an American minority, composed of politicians and military men and their henchmen who see in the governments of the countries a field in which to satisfy their appetites. Those people are always ready to take over a government by any means, and to hold it by blood and fire. They help each other, in a real alliance, and declare war against the democratic forces.

It is necessary that their soldiers know that they do not go to war simply to kill, but also to die. If it is not so, they will continue to hold all the advantages of aggressiveness and the lack of principles, and the good people all the inhibitions of decency and morality.

It is demonstrated that it is almost impossible, when a dictator is overthrown, "to catch the fat fish." Those always find the way to escape with their millions. Those who remain behind pay their debts. This injustice, superimposed on all the others, should serve as a warning: He who lets himself serve as a paid assassin of a tyrant should know that it is own life which is in danger, and not that of his master. The day when there are no instruments there will be no tyrants.

Society should protect itself by methods adequate to the circumstances. If the circumstances are extraordinary, the social defenses should also be extraordinary. No one who knows the barbaric extremes to which the recent torturers in Cuba, Venezuela, and other republics, arrived will be able to deny with his conscience that the corrective methods should be extreme, keeping relationship with the magnitude of the crimes and the propensity to commit them.

For the well-being of society, the law of vengeance cannot be recommended: eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth. The torturers should not be disrespected or tortured. But capital punishment, summary execution, turns out, in these extreme cases, by a cruel paradox, to be a civilized way to repress delinquency.

It is almost inconceivable the level of cruelty which the political delinquency in the 20th century has reached. Civilization needs to resort to the most painful methods to detain the tide. This spectacle of our times led a penalist of the stature of Jimenez de Asua to declare, a short time after World War II, that he would prefer the revolutionary justice in whose name the Italian people simply hung by the feet Mussolini and his lover, to the type of cold, slow, judicial process which was adopted in the Nuremburg trials.

Those who today favor that the Cuban war criminals be tried in common courts are not in touch with the present circumstances. There is no doubt, in every city and in every town, who were the principal murderers. Poor Cuba. It would be a tragic comedy to present proofs. The proofs are not even in the cemeteries. The corpses are in the wells, in the sewers, in the basements. And, just as happened in Venezuela, those who did not reach the relief of death from the tortures will be in insane asylums for the rest of their lives.

If the provisional Government does not rapidly execute the most notorious criminals, public passion, indignant at the impunity or the delay, will overflow, and then the number of deaths will be many, many thousands.

If there is not an exemplary punishment which leaves an impression in the memory of the country, the assassins will soon be organizing invasions, with the millions of dollars removed by the tyranny, in order to impose it again.

The Cuban people have suffered great disillusionments. I hope that today's revolution will not disillusion them again. For the time being, the severity of the punishment seems to me a salutary measure, however distressing. I believe it my duty to back it, in spite of the fact that I consider capital punishment repugnant, inadmissible, in other circumstances.

Undue Banking Concentration Must Be Stopped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me before the Wisconsin Bankers Association at the Hotel Schroeder, Milwaukee, Wis., Monday, January 26, 1959.

The address follows:

I am very happy to be here with members of this distinguished group which has been in the forefront in seeking to maintain a sound, vigorously competitive unit banking system in this country and to arrest the trend which is slowly concentrating our financial resources into fewer and fewer hands. The members of this association are well aware that the healthy growth of independent banks is of vital importance for the preservation of our traditional, free enterprise system. That system is premised on a diffusion of economic power and depends upon economic activity being controlled by the market and not manipulated by a handful of men.

It is for these reasons, I think, that the American concept of banking traditionally has been based on community banking which provides the widest range of financial services to the people in the area. In my judgment, independent banks, locally organized, locally financed, and locally managed, not only act as a necessary balance wheel to offset the power of big business, they tend to provide a much healthier basis for effective community organization than does the absentee ownership of mammoth banking institutions. In fact, it is the independent bank—not the giant financial house—which in many cases provides the new ideas from which widespread innovations originate.

During the last 35 years, however, events have transpired in the field of banking which have severely transformed the entire structure of the Nation's banking system and have threatened to alter fundamental assumptions underlying the deposit and credit structure of the economy. In the last 35 years, the banking population of the country has been more than halved notwithstanding that the business transacted by the commercial banking system has multiplied many times. In 1921, there were over 30,000 commercial banks as compared to approximately 13,500 at the present time. True, a large share of the Nation's losses occurred prior to 1933 because of the depression when approximately 9,000 banks were forced to suspend operations during the 4-year period between 1930 and the end of 1933. However, since 1933, the merger movement has been the major factor in the gradual decline in the total number of banks. For example, in the period 1950 through 1958, some 1,330 of the Nation's commercial banks have disappeared by way of mergers and consolidations. Many of these consolidations, I would hasten to add, have been primarily the outgrowth of a deliberate effort on the part of certain banks to expand their banking facilities, add to their capital and depositors, and, in general, increase their overall financial strength in the economy.

This depletion of the ranks of the country's banks has lessened competition among banks in many communities. Over 76 counties in the United States have no commercial banking facilities whatsoever, while more than half the counties in the United States have only three or fewer banks serving the needs of the community. Hundreds of small, rural American communities have become bankless towns and many others are served by only one bank in place of the two or three which existed in the 1920's.

Other important trends have accompanied the demise of many of the Nation's banks. In the first place, banks have gradually been increasing in size. A bank that was considered large in size in the midthirties is now a relatively small institution. Smaller banks have become fewer in number, the big banks greater in proportion to the banking population.

In addition, the banking system has become characterized by a high degree of concentration of financial resources where a few large banks control a disproportionate share of total loans and deposits. Today the 100 largest banks control more than 48 percent of the Nation's bank deposits. In 10 of the Nation's 16 leading financial centers, 4 banks own more than 80 percent of all commercial assets. Furthermore, in nine of these financial centers, two banks own more than 60 percent of all commercial bank assets. Again, in each of the 16 leading financial centers, the first two banks own more than 40 percent of all the commercial assets, the first four banks, 60 percent.

Another aspect is concentration through bank holding companies which exercise a high degree of control over banking facilities in many areas. In Massachusetts, for example, holding companies control 48.5 percent of all commercial banking deposits; in Minnesota, two bank holding companies control 45 percent of commercial bank deposits; in Montana, the same two companies control over 44 percent of the commercial bank deposits; in Oregon, one company controls 42 percent of the State's bank deposits; in Nevada, the same company holds 78 percent of the commercial bank deposits. And here in Milwaukee, one bank, controlled by a holding company, has 48.8 percent of all deposits in the city.

The increase in banking concentration has been coupled with a comparative contraction in the credit extended to borrowers by the banking system. As banks have grown larger, they have tended to have fewer dealings with smaller businesses. A study conducted by the Federal Reserve Board several years ago shows that the very large banks with deposits of $500 million or more had the least number of loans with small business of all classes of banks, the next to lowest dollar volume of loans with small business, and the smallest percentage of dollar volume of all loans with small business. Considering the decrease in the proportion of small banks in the financial community, the overall drop in credit extended, and the frequent resort to Government agencies for funds, it seems likely that the increasing trend toward concentration has at times entailed credit shortages especially for smaller enterprises.

There is increasing awareness, I believe, that additional precautions are essential to preserve the banking competition that still remains and to prevent banking credit from becoming dominated to an ever-increasing extent by a small tightly knit group. Successfully resisted in New York State last year, for example, were bills which would accomplish the following: First, permit bank holding company expansion throughout the State without regard to bank branch district lines, thus ending the freeze on bank holding company expansion except in accordance with branch geographic limitations; second, obliterate the branch district line between New York City and the suburban areas hence permitting bank expansion throughout the entire new district.

As I pointed out to Governor Harriman, adoption of such legislation not only would have the gravest consequences in respect of the State's future banking structure, but would bring banking monopoly closer into being. It would also have had the gravest repercussions throughout the Nation, since what happens in New York in the banking field frequently sets the stage for numerous other States.

Adoption of the first proposal, I indicated, would enable a bank, via the holding company device, to circumvent branch district lines and enable the same management, which is restricted in its operations under a bank charter, to acquire through a holding company a unit bank in the State of New York regardless of where situated and operate it in the same manner a branch would be operated. It was my position that this proposal would accomplish indirectly what is prohibited by the State in establishing branch district lines and would have effectively dissolved branch limitations. Beyond that, it seemed crystal clear to me that the proposal could have ignited what might have been the greatest chain reaction in recent banking history, the effects of which threatened to go to the very roots of the entire banking structure of New York State.

With respect to the proposal to obliterate the branch district line between New York City and the suburban counties, I emphasized that these district lines were drawn to protect independent banking from encroachment of the giant money-market institutions in New York City, and that it was of even greater importance now to guard against such encroachment.

In my several communications to Governor Harriman, I also emphasized that to adopt either proposal would be to yield without justification to a few powerful financial institutions in New York City, which have, for years, sought to achieve dominance over the banking system of the entire State of New York.

The Independent Bankers Association, of which your group is a constituent part, played an important role in mustering effective opposition to this legislation. It is to be commended as is Governor Harriman who, recognizing the importance of unit banks, maintained unrelenting resistance to these measures.

I am sure the sponsors of this legislation will renew their efforts to secure passage of these proposals. I trust that the new Governor of New York, Mr. Rockefeller, will act with the same dedication to the public interest in opposing such measures as did his predecessor.

Also noteworthy this past year was rejection by the Federal Reserve Board of a plan by the First National City Bank of New York, the second largest in the city, to evade New York State statutory limitations preventing banks in New York City from establishing branches outside the boundaries of New York City. This it tried to do by applying to the Federal Reserve Board for permission to form a bank holding company with the initial objective of acquiring control of the County Trust Co. of White Plains, N.Y., the dominant commercial bank in Westchester County. In opposing this plan, I testified in detail before the Board that its consummation would be contrary to the competitive standards of the Bank Holding Company Act and in violation of the Celler-Kefauver act; that its effectuation could mean the end of branch district lines in the State; and could mean basic alteration of the State's banking structure completely without the approval of the State's legislature. My good friend Mr. Ben DuBois of the Independent Bankers Association, likewise testified in opposition to this proposal and, I might add, presented most persuasive arguments. It is gratifying that the majority of the Board recognized the serious competitive implications of this proposal and rejected it on that basis.

No less significant are the proposed mergers between the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York and J. P. Morgan & Co. and between the Manufacturers Trust Co. and the Bankers Trust Co. There is little doubt that consummation of either of these transactions would result in an undue concentration of banking facilities in the city; spur a further wave of bank mergers; and ignite a chain reaction that could have the most profound repercussions on our banking structure.

In view of the apparent impact these transactions would have on the competitive situation, I have communicated with the superintendent of banks of New York State whose aproval is required, together with the Federal Reserve Board which also must approve in the event either of the continuing banks establishes branches at locations of former offices of the absorbed institution. In addition, I have written to the Department of Justice which has jurisdiction under the Sherman Act which prohibits any combination in restraint of trade, attempt to monopolize, or monopolization.

With respect to these merger proposals, it is relevant that 3 years ago the New York superintendent of banks, Mr. George A. Mooney, testified before our Antitrust Subcommittee:

"It has been my policy as superintendent of banks of the State of New York to follow the spirit of the Celler Antimerger Act in determining whether or not to approve mergers of banks that come within my jurisdiction. That is to say, if after analysis of all facts, I find that the effect of a proposed bank merger may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to monopoly in any locality, I will unhesitatingly withhold approval."

Mr. Mooney's term expired a few weeks ago. In the circumstances, it is vitally important that his successor who will be appointed by Governor Rockefeller adhere scrupulously to the above policy in scrutinizing the Guaranty Trust-Morgan and Manufacturers Trust-Bankers Trust merger proposals. I would also note that before leaving office Mr. Mooney advised me that his Department was undertaking a thorough investigation of the Guaranty-Morgan proposal.

I hope that the new superintendent not only continues that investigation but broadens it to include the Manufacturers Trust-Bankers Trust transaction. I trust that the superintendent will, in addition, consult with the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice and the Federal Reserve Board as to the competitive aspects of these mergers. Furthermore, I believe it necessary that the superintendent hold public hearings on the proposals so that all interested persons may be afforded an opportunity to present their views.

Let me make it clear that as chairman of the Antitrust Subcommittee, I will keep a watchful eye on all developments.

On the positive side, additional Federal legislation dealing with bank mergers is imperative if we are to stop undue concentration and keep a unit banking system in this country. For there is little doubt that present Federal law on this subject is grossly inadequate.

Under the National Banking Act, approval of the Comptroller of the Currency is required for any merger between national banks, or between a national bank and a State bank, where the resultant institution is a national bank. In addition, the Federal Deposit Insurance Act requires that approval of certain mergers must be obtained from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency, or the Federal Reserve Board, as the case may be, but only where the capital stock or surplus of the resulting bank will be less than the aggregate stock of the two institutions combined. Also, approval of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation is required for mergers between insured and noninsured banks. None of these Federal banking statutes applicable to mergers deals substantively with competition in the field of banking, and in no case is the competitive impact of the merger a necessary element to be considered by Federal banking officials in deciding whether or not to grant approval.

Bank mergers are also circumscribed by the provisions of the Sherman Act of 1890 which prohibit combinations in restraint of trade, attempts to monopolize, or monopolization of trade or commerce. Illegality is established by proof that the merger has actually resulted in an unreasonable lessening of competition; it is immaterial whether the merger was accomplished by stock or asset acquisitions.

Section 7 of the Clayton Act of 1914, on the other hand, deals specifically with corporate and bank mergers and bans those achieved by stock purchases where there is a reasonable probability of a substantial lessening of competition or a tendency to monopoly. Responsibility for enforcing the section insofar as banks are concerned is vested concurrently in the Attorney General and the Federal Reserve Board.

Section 7 was designed to stop mergers beyond the reach of the Sherman Act but its failure to include mergers accomplished by asset acquisitions resulted in a loophole which so far as nonbanking corporations are concerned was closed by passage of the Celler-Kefauver Act of 1950. However, because of revisions made in subsequent versions of various antimerger bills, it became impracticable to include within the scope of the Celler-Kefauver Act corporations other than those subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission. This left asset acquisitions by banks unaffected by the new law since authority to enforce the provisions of section 7 dealing with banks is vested in the Federal Reserve Board and not in the Federal Trade Commission.

Beyond this, most bank mergers are accomplished by asset acquisitions. For this reason section 7 of the Clayton Act has limited value in coping with the mounting trend of bank merger activity.

Against this background I believe it necessary as a first step that section 18(c) of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Act be amended in the following respects:

First, the provisions of existing law should be expanded so as to require prior approval by the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency for every merger or consolidation involving insured banks;

Second, the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency should be prohibited from approving any bank merger or consolidation where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly;

Third, the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency should be required to give notice to the Attorney General of a proposed merger and enable him to intervene or offer his views respecting the competitive phases of the transaction;

Fourth, the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency should be required to give notice with opportunity to be heard to the appropriate supervisory authority of the interested State in the event the transaction involves State banks;

Fifth, an antitrust savings clause should be adopted for bank mergers similar to that governing bank holding companies which would make it clear that applicable provisions of the antitrust laws pertaining to banks are not to be superseded.

In addition, the loophole in section 7 of the Clayton Act should be closed and Federal enforcement agencies should be provided with the same authority to move against bank mergers accomplished by asset acquisition as they have to move against bank mergers consummated by way of stock acquisitions.

It is important to note that amendment of the banking laws in this area is not inconsistent with amendment of the antitrust laws to cover bank mergers accomplished by asset acquisitions. Indeed, adoption of the approach that I have outlined would mean, in effect, that the antitrust statutory provisions pertaining to bank mergers would be essentially similar to provisions presently applicable to bank holding company acquisition of banking facilities.

The Federal banking agencies, while recommending amendment of existing laws so as to require prior approval of all bank mergers, feel that in granting or withholding consent, they should be required only "to take into consideration whether the effect (of the proposed transaction) may be to lessen competition unduly or to tend unduly to create a monopoly." They oppose the approach recommended above that would require them to disapprove a merger where the effect may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to monopoly.

Under the suggestion of the banking agencies competitive considerations would be only one of the various factors that would have to be taken into account by the appropriate Federal banking agency in scrutinizing a proposed bank merger. Moreover, they would have Congress adopt an entirely novel test, namely, whether the acquisition may lessen competition unduly or tend unduly to create a monopoly. Indisputably this proposed standard is far weaker than that of section 7 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Celler-Kefauver Act which applies to other businesses and prohibits any merger where the effect of the acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly. Nor are the characteristics of the banking industry so unique as to justify such departure.

The term "substantially lessen competition" has been imbedded in Federal jurisprudence for some 35 years in the course of which it has received judicial content through numerous court interpretations. If we discard this standard for the vague and novel standard of "unduly," we will find ourselves in a sea of trouble. It took years and years to determine through court interpretation what the term "substantially to lessen competition" means. Should the banking agencies' proposal be adopted, not only would the courts have to start all over again in interpreting a vague and untested term, there would be created—and without justification—a dual standard, one for banks, another for nonbanking corporations.

Also, it must be recognized that if the Congress should adopt the standard proposed by the banking agencies and proscribe only bank mergers which tend unduly to monopoly, then the Congress in effect would be placing its imprimatur of approval on mergers which tend to monopoly. Stated otherwise, adoption of the "unduly" standard would mean that it is the policy of Congress that a bank merger which tends to monopoly is in the public interest; that only if it tends unduly to monopoly should it be banned.

The short of the matter is that, as a former Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division testified, "the banking agencies' proposal does little if anything, to insure competitive enterprise in banking. Any pretense that it does seems to me hardly more than sham."

More than that, the proposal of the banking agencies would weaken the competitive standards which the Comptroller of the Currency now professes to follow with respect to bank mergers. It will be recalled that approval of the Comptroller of the Currency is required in all cases of mergers between national banks, or between a national bank and a State bank where the resultant institution is to be operated under a national charter. I point out that the Comptroller has stated on numerous occasions that before granting merger approval, he will determine whether its effect in any section of the country may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly; that he will determine, in sum, whether the transaction is violative of the policy of the Celler-Kefauver Act.

The conclusion is inescapable, however, as the Attorney General has testified, that the Office of the Comptroller has tended to give little or no consideration to the question as to whether or not competition would be substantially lessened.

It is important that legislation in this area require the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency to give notice to the Attorney General. As the Department of Justice has observed, "Failure to insure informed advice on competitive factors could have effects far beyond the banking field. Without [the Department's] right to intervene in bank mergers there might be as many different views of section 7 standards and scope as there were agencies charged with this enforcement. The result could well be disparities in view, which, in turn, spell real enforcement inequities. Enforcement effectiveness as well requires some procedure for [the] Department's intervention. Otherwise in its overall responsibility for section 7's enforcement * * * outside of the banking area, the Department would be bound by bank merger precedent [it] had no voice in picking or shaping."

In these circumstances, it would be little short of folly to require the appropriate Federal bank supervisory agency to obtain the views of the other two banking agencies, as the agencies have recommended, but not impose the same requirement in respect to seeking the informed advice of the Department of Justice—the one agency possessing the necessary competency to make an informed recommendation respecting competitive implications of a proposed merger.

Furthermore, on the basis of past experience, unless a requirement of mandatory consultation with the Department is written into law, there is little, if any, likelihood that the Federal banking agencies will seek the informed advice of the Attorney General.

The foregoing considerations are equally applicable in respect to obtaining the views of the appropriate State banking supervisor when the continuing institution is to be a State bank. In such cases it is as necessary to obtain the views of the appropriate local official as it is the views of the other two Federal banking agencies since the State supervisor usually will have special knowledge of local banking and other matters, factors which are of the highest degree or relevance to a determination as to whether final approval should be granted or withheld.

Amendment of existing law is essential in another respect: to prohibit holding company acquisition of banks within a State except within the area within which branches of banks are permitted. Such provision, it will be recalled, was incorporated in section 5(c) of the Spence bank holding company bill

(H.R. 6627) which was adopted overwhelmingly by the House in the 84th Congress, though the section was later deleted in conference. Subsequent developments have only served to underscore need for its enactment. Absent such provision, State geographic limitations have been and can be avoided by the simple expedient of forming a holding company to acquire control of banks throughout a State without regard to district lines. To my mind the conclusion is inescapable that despite all that has been said about the distinction between bank holding company groups and branch banking systems, both accomplish the same thing—the operation of a number of banking units under one control and management. Through the corporate device, holding companies still can be used to evade branch banking laws and defeat the declared policies of the State regarding branch banking. This should not be tolerated.

Bear in mind that the overriding purpose of the Bank Holding Company Act and of State branching restrictions is similar: to safeguard against banking monopoly by minimizing the dangers inherent in concentration of economic power through centralized banking control. Yet, the Bank Holding Company Act, by permitting the piercing of branch district lines through the holding company device, is now serving as a convenient vehicle for fostering just that banking concentration which it is designed to prevent. I can think of no greater anomaly.

The legislation I have recommended above is the minimum necessary to preserve competition in the banking field. I shall do everything possible to see to its enactment during this Congress and I am confident that with the help of your association and other like-minded organizations, it will be approved by the present Congress.

One Hundred and Fortieth Anniversary Commemoration of Abraham Lincoln's Birth—One of History's Greatest Men

OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, by reason of unanimous consent heretofore granted me so to do, I am pleased to again present a few remarks, further and again affirming the great inspiration the life and the sacrificial death of the great commoner has always been to me.

The last occasion, a couple of years ago, when Mrs. Doyle and I again stopped at the dirt-floored, one-windowed cabin at Hodgenville, Ky., where he was born, which is being so nicely and appropriately preserved, it was borne upon me again that his life had not only been one of extreme hardship and trial, but had in fact been one in which there had been a fair share of romance.

Then we continued to travel during the following few weeks the full length of the Lincoln Trail through Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois. I respectfully suggest it would not be amiss for many American parents to take the young folks of their family and spend some of their vacation time in taking this same trail. Increasingly I appraise as accurate and correct the statement of Secretary Stanton at the bedside of Lincoln about 94 years ago when he said, "Now he belongs to the ages."

So, Mr. Speaker, so much will be written and said of him by others more talented and gifted than I during these next few days that I will close these remarks by repeating the significant and historical, true and correct statement, which has been frequently stated before, which is to the effect that more books, both foreign and domestic, have already been written about Abraham Lincoln than any other civil ruler of government in all the world's history.

When I was a lad in the fifth grade of elementary school I used to draw the outlines of the birthplace cabin of Abraham Lincoln on my school slate when I should have been applying myself to my studies to be recited upon yet that day. I now realize I was doing in those very early years of my young life, in a very meager way, what the brilliant, informed brains of men and women of many lands have done in a truly magnificent manner in these subsequent years to the days when I drew the cabin on the slate and then tried to wash it out with the sponge before the teacher caught me violating her edict to study instead of wasting my time.

In Honor of the Boy Scouts of America

OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, during the week of February 7 to February 13, the attention of the Nation is centered on the Boy Scouts of America.

The Scouts are proud of their organization; of its happy, wholesome program of activities; and its contributions to the making of a finer America.

As we, their elders, are proud of them.

Men and women devote their lives to their work, their homes, and their children.

But the greatest satisfaction they derive from all this effort is to see their youngsters become worthy of the advantages and the opportunities provided for them.

In our youth we knew little about the Boy Scouts. There were no troops available for us to join; and no one to direct us toward this organization that offers such fulfillment for the energy, the enthusiasm, and the natural idealism of youth.

If we had our lives to live over again, we would make certain to engage in those activities that we missed, and high among these would be membership in the Boy Scouts of America.

For there is no movement in this country that does more to make a boy self-sufficient, courteous, and inspired by the right thinking and the right doing that develops a good man and a good citizen than the Boy Scouts.

I am humbly grateful for this emblem you have presented to me, and I shall be happy to wear it in celebration of the week that is set aside to honor your fine organization.

But do not ask me to go camping just yet. You will have to teach me the ropes before I can qualify for life in the great outdoors.

Even though boyhood days are far behind me, I admire your spirit, your healthy adventures, and your consideration for other people, that you are learning as members of your local troop.

Congratulations to the Boy Scouts of America.

Speech of Hon. Arthur Winstead at the Mississippi Products Dinner

OF
HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I submit herewith a speech delivered by my distinguished colleague, the Honorable ARTHUR WINSTEAD, of Mississippi, on the occasion of the Mississippi products dinner on December 6 last at the Sheraton Park Hotel, Washington, D.C.

It will be recalled that the Dixie Darlings and the band from Mississippi Southern College, located in my own congressional district at Hattiesburg, Miss., were honored guests on this occasion. The next day they put on one of the best half-time football shows ever exhibited in these United States on the occasion of the pro football game between the Washington Redskins and the Pittsburgh Steelers. The menu at the dinner consisted of delicacies from Mississippi.

Mississippi Southern College, although a comparatively young institution, has achieved an outstanding record among the colleges of the Nation in the short period of its existence. It is famous not only for its outstanding prowess on the gridiron and its Dixie Darlings, but for the enviable record in the scholastic field that it has achieved.

The speaker on the occasion of the Mississippi products dinner given by the Mississippi Day Committee was my distinguished colleague, Congressman ARTHUR WINSTEAD.

His speech follows:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. George Marshall, ladies and gentlemen, this is a most happy occasion. Personally, I feel that we Mississippians in Washington are greatly honored by the visit of the Dixie Darlings, the pride of Mississippi, the marching band from Mississippi Southern College, officials of Mississippi Southern, and the many fine people who have come to the Capital from our State to be with us on this great occasion.

As an alumnus of Mississippi Southern, I feel also that our fine institution has been honored. Of course, our Dixie Darlings and band deserve the honor. They were chosen this year as the outstanding college drill team and band in the Nation and will perform tomorrow over a national radio and television network between the halves at the Washington Redskins-Pittsburgh Steelers football game. We are proud of the fine achievements of Mississippi Southern, which is the fastest growing institution of higher learning in the South.

We are proud that this great institution was honored when its band and Dixie Darlings were chosen as star performers at our first annual Mississippi products dinner in Washington.

Now, I know that Mississippians in Washington try to keep up with what is going on back home. However, I would like to call your attention to some of the outstanding achievements of Mississippi in agriculture and in agricultural industry, dramatized here tonight.

Up on Capitol Hill here in Washington we often find outstanding proof of the popularity of gulf coast shrimp. Several times a year our friends on the gulf coast send up shrimp for seafood luncheons and dinners. And none of these congressional parties ever go begging when we let our colleagues know we are having a shrimp feed. Every first-class restaurant features gulf coast shrimp. To add to this tasty cocktail, Jimmy Love has supplied his delicious sauce. Jimmy has made this remoulade sauce, perfected by the Buena Vista Hotel, famous throughout the Nation.

You have not enjoyed real gumbo until you have tasted Pascagoula crab gumbo. Hermes Gautier, Pascagoula's ambassador of good will, is here tonight to enjoy with us this wonderful gulf coast delicacy.

We often hear that so-called western beef makes the finest steaks in America. But did you know that often top grade Mississippi beef sells on the Memphis market at prices higher than the same grade of western beef sells at the same time in Kansas City, Chicago, and Omaha? We are honored tonight by the presence of the world's No. 1 polled Hereford cattleman. I refer, of course, to my good friend, "Hot" Moore of Senatobia. Each year for the past 17 years, Mr. Moore's Circle M Ranch has staged the top cattle sale in America.

Last February, he sold a champion polled Hereford bull for $55,000, and that is the world's record price for any bull. We are proud of the fine achievements of Mississippi cattlemen and farmers in bringing our State to the forefront in livestock production.

Now, over in my district, in Scott County, we have the world's No. 1 poultry processing activity.

The chicken breasts that you will enjoy here tonight were supplied by my personal friend of Morton, Benny Rogers, who has one of the biggest chicken processing plants in existence. I stopped in to see Benny while I was in Mississippi this fall. As I parked in front of his plant a big truck, loaded with Mississippi chickens was pulling out for Los Angeles. Our Scott County chicken industry supplies poultry throughout the United States and many foreign countries.

The vegetables you are enjoying tonight were supplied by Wally Wright, one of the Nation's biggest wholesale grocers. He has wholesale stores throughout Mississippi and is interested in similar operations in other States. You will enjoy the lady peas, cooked southern style, and the delicious baked potatoes served you here tonight.

Mississippi has always been a leader in the production of dairy products. Mississippi Dairy Products Association shipped to our dinner pure creamery butter produced in our State. The Hattiesburg Creamery has surprised us with the addition of about 200 gallons of Hattiesburg ice cream to give you a choice of desserts.

But, before we come to the dessert, permit me to call to your attention the wonderful deviled egg salad, made from the recipe of Mrs. L. E. Burnett, whose husband is the head of an organization known as "Better Eggs, Inc.," at Jackson. Mississippi grocers no longer find it necessary to import eggs to meet the table demands of our people.

Then, of course, we are enjoying wonderful Stafford Springs mineral water. Stafford Springs is also in my district. Stafford Springs water is most pleasant tasting, as you have already noted, and has very fine medicinal qualities.

Now, we come to the dessert. Many Mississippians contend that molasses pecan pie originated in our State.

The molasses in the pie here tonight is the very finest Marion County blue ribbon cane sirup. Lester Williams, nationally known weekly newspaper publisher who also owns the radio station at Columbia, was responsible for the sirup.

South Mississippi pecans were supplied by the Funsten Pecan Co., of Hattiesburg, and the Natchez Pecan Shelling Co., of Natchez. The pecan industry also contributes substantially to our Mississippi economy. At this time of the year, they are in demand in all parts of the country, for pecans are essential in any good Christmas fruitcake.

We are most grateful to Mr. George Marshall, of the Washington Redskins, and to Philip Morris, sponsors of the national radio and television show for tomorrow, for helping us make possible this occasion.

Now, let's all have a good time and join in telling our friends in Washington about what a great State we have in Mississippi.

Oh, yes; before I sit down I want to ask a very pertinent question. My question is directed to Ole Miss and Mississippi State. Why don't you play Mississippi Southern?

Unjustified Oil Price Increase

OF

HON. SAMUEL S. STRATTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. STRATTON. No problem has been brought more forcefully or more repeatedly to the Members of the 86th Congress than has the problem of inflation and the need for holding the line in our price structure. The President of the United States has made this the major theme in two of the messages which he has submitted to this body, the state of the Union message and the economic report of the President.

In his state of the Union message Mr. Eisenhower said:

We must avoid any contribution to inflationary processes, which could disrupt sound growth in our economy. Prices have displayed a welcome stability in recent months and, if we are wise and resolute, we will not tolerate inflation in the years to come. * * * Inflation can be prevented. But this demands statesmanship on the part of business and labor leaders and of Government at all levels.

In his economic report the President touched on the same line:

Our objective must be to establish a firm foundation for extending economic growth with stable prices in the months and years ahead. This will not come about automatically. * * * Self-discipline and restraint are essential if reasonable stability of prices is to be reached within the framework of the free competitive institutions on which we rely heavily for the improvement of our material welfare.

Among the commodities which are essential to our modern civilization, in the rural areas no less than in the urban and industrial areas, is oil, especially oil for heating purposes. I have been deeply disturbed, Mr. Speaker, to learn that in sections of the 32d Congressional District of New York a wholesale oil price increase has gone into effect within recent days. In the village of Cooperstown, N.Y., the famous home of baseball, the major oil companies have just instituted an increase of one-half a cent per gallon in No. 2 oil, boosting the total price on this commodity to 16.4 cents a gallon, the highest in history. A similar increase of one-half a cent per gallon has gone into effect in Gloversville, and a similar increase has been authorized for Schenectady and Oneonta.

In Cooperstown alone it has been estimated that this increase will cost consumers about $7,000 during the next 2 winter months, when the necessity for oil is at its height.

I have been informed, Mr. Speaker, that at the same time this price increase has gone into effect for individual home consumers, that the oil companies have negotiated an arrangement with the Otsego County Courthouse to deliver oil at a price which is a cent a gallon less than Cooperstown dealers are themselves required to pay for the same product.

Let me make clear, Mr. Speaker, that this increase has not resulted from action by the local dealers, but has been dictated by the oil companies themselves, and without any justification. As a result the dealers are as hard pressed as the consumers, because their margin of profit has been forced down.

Irresponsible action of this kind is contrary to the call made by the President, and is the type of thing that could most directly contribute to the kind of runaway inflation we all abhor.

Because inflation, Mr. Speaker, is something that can come upon us gradually step by step, without our fully realizing it, I believe that this unjustified price increase ought to be fully explored immediately, and I have therefore referred the facts concerning it both to the congressional committee which is investigating all aspects of so-called administered prices and to the Justice Department for possible antitrust action on their part.

We in the Congress and in the Nation must act promptly and together to prevent such unjustified increases and to hold the line against inflation.

Under unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I include at this point an editorial from the Freeman's Journal, of Cooperstown, one of the oldest regular weekly newspapers in our Nation. The editorial appeared on January 21, 1959:

UNJUSTIFIED OIL PRICE INCREASE

Last week, the major companies which supply Cooperstown dealers with fuel oil announced a half-cent-a-gallon price increase, which local dealers of necessity have had to pass on to their customers because of the small margin of profit per gallon on which they operate. The dealers did not—and rarely do—add on anything extra for themselves. In fact their profit per gallon is just about the same now as it was 10 years ago. They've been able to maintain this per gallon profit, despite increasing costs, because of a higher business volume over the past 10 years.

Last week's price rise, initiated by the oil companies, ran the price of No. 2 oil to 16.4 cents a gallon, the highest in history here. There was no justification for this increase—it simply is a matter of price gouging on the part of the major producers who seem to operate on the theory that if you can come up with some excuse—no matter how flimsy—you've got a moral right to charge whatever the traffic will bear under a given set of conditions.

This time the oil companies have the flimsiest of excuses. They plead that this winter has been colder than usual so far, and that demand for oil has outstripped their refinery capacity. They've had to go into the open market, they say, and pay independent producers a premium for their product in order to get enough oil to meet this demand. That's a lot of bunk. They may have to do that to cover a small percentage of their requirements, but this percentage would be so small that a major producer would have to search and search for a legitimate excuse to boost the price by even a tenth of a cent a gallon, much less five times this amount.

Another thing that sticks in our craw about this oil company piracy, is this—how come a major producer can deliver oil to the Otsego County Courthouse at a price which is about a cent a gallon under the price Cooperstown dealers have to pay for the same basic product? This means that the county pays about $60 a tank truck load less for its oil than local dealers pay for the same amount.

Why should it cost $60 more to deliver a truckload of oil from a terminal (Albany or Utica or Binghamton) to the storage plants of two local dealers only a few hundred feet from the courthouse, and to the third dealer who is less than a mile from the courthouse? The consumer could use this penny-a-gallon saving, and we're sure the local dealers would pass it on to him.

This latest half-cent increase by the oil companies is going to cost Cooperstown consumers about $7,000 during the next 2 winter months.

We would like to emphasize that this oil price increase has been none of the doing of your local dealers. They aren't going to make any more money out of it. In fact, their percentage of profit has dropped.

Don't get mad at him. But if this latest price increase makes you want to sound off, well, go ahead and sound off—but to the oil companies, who are the culprits. Your local dealer will forward your letter to the company if you can't find the latter's address.

Lincoln Penny Changes Garb First Time Since 1909

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, by reason of unanimous consent heretofore granted me so to do, I make these brief remarks about the brandnew Abraham Lincoln penny which penny makes its bow to the public commemorating the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

You will recall that President Dwight D. Eisenhower of the United States of America approved the new design of this historic penny on December 20, 1958, and that same cannot be changed except by law; if it is changed at all; and then only by congressional authority after 25 years. This, of course, will make it very, very difficult for so many counterfeiters to profit off of the theme and extensive daily use of the penny. My reading indicates that the Abraham Lincoln penny as we have known it, until the birth of this new penny in commemoration of the 150th birthday, was designed and created by Frank Gasparro, an employee of the Philadelphia, Pa., Mint.

This new penny is quite different, because it will have on its reverse side for the first time a very legible, discernible view of the magnificent Abraham Lincoln Memorial, situated right here in our Nation's Capital. On the several occasions, I have already spoken in commemoration of Abraham Lincoln, I have on each occasion, and I do now, urge every Member of this great legislative body to visit the Lincoln Memorial both in the daytime and during the nighttime as well. It is closed, by the way, at 9 o'clock sharp at night. The motto "E Pluribus Unum" also appears on the new penny below the designation of the penny as "One Cent." However, the original front of the penny with which we are all familiar, and which was designed by Mr. V. D. Brenner, remains as it has been.

In connection with the issuance of this historic penny, the National Geographic Society gives us some interesting facts about the history of the penny as we have known it. Here are those facts:

At least 25 billion cents have been produced since 1909, according to Geographic. Each day, mints produce about 15 tons of cents worth $43,500, but costing only about $10,396. Each coin contains 45.6 grains of copper, mixed with 2.4 grains of zinc and tin. Precise minting lightens the chore for those handling pennies by the thousands. They weigh them instead of counting, since there are exactly 145 cents to the pound.

The Responsibility of Maintaining Permanent Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, early last September I had the privilege to attend the Seventh Conference of the World Parliamentarians Association in France. There were parliamentarians from 28 countries in attendance. The aims of our meeting were expressed through a charter which we adopted at Versailles on September 8. My remarks moving the adoption of the Charter of Versailles are, under a previous consent, included below along with the text of the charter:

REMARKS BY REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES O. PORTER, THE PALACE OF VERSAILLES, SEPTEMBER 8, 1958

Mr. President, distinguished Lord Attlee, and distinguished ladies and gentlemen, I am deeply honored to be permitted to move adoption of the Charter of Versailles.

Although I am the only Member of the United States Congress present here today, you may be sure that there are many other Members who agree with our aims and who will help attain them.

My 460,000 constituents in the Fourth Congressional District of Oregon on the westernmost side of the United States join with the peoples of the world in demanding that the rule of law replaces the rule of force before it is too late.

While we must dream, must look ahead beyond seemingly impassable difficulties of history, languages, and culture, we must also be skeptics. Here we are in a beautiful historic palace, the scene of many crucial decisions in the fate of great nations. Is our Charter of Versailles a scrap of paper which will rate not even the sneer of a latter-day Caesar?

Paper and ink alone will not overcome greed and fear. The hour is too late for mere gestures, however pretty. This charter is a call to action, particular action, or it is worse than nothing.

In the 85th U.S. Congress, recently adjourned, I joined with my colleagues in voting to appropriate some $40 billion to keep my country strong. I am proud to be an officer in the Air Force Reserve. But, along with you I yearn for an end to the waste, the futility, the catastrophe of war.

What do we do to make our solemn act today meaningful?

Here are my recommendations, humbly presented for your consideration both as dreamers and as skeptics.

First, the call of this charter should be presented immediately to the chief executive and the legislative body of every nation. They must decide. The people of the world want their affirmation without delay. Specifically it is my hope that the decision will be to consider these vital matters at a United Nations Charter Revision Conference in 1959.

In my country we have a special problem. The Secretary of State holds that such matters are not within "the proper scope of the review conference." This means that the President or the Congress must overrule Mr. Dulles or Mr. Dulles has to change his mind or, regrettably in my opinion, the conference must be held outside the United Nations.

My intention is to present a copy of this charter to President Eisenhower directly upon my return home and to ask that he give his opinion about it and that he consider changing the policy laid down by his Secretary of State.

Both President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles are clearly on record endorsing world law as the only road to world peace. Less than 2 months ago in Washington the President declared that the attainment of peace required that nations make mutual concessions of sovereignty so that law could become the basis for settling their disputes.

To gain universal and enthusiastic acceptance of the aims set forth in the charter will require strong delegations of this association in every country. In the face of ignorance and prejudice this will not be easy. It may be that the first conference, because of the reluctance of some or even all of the big powers, will be a foothills conference of the other nations, a step which I believe would lead the peoples in the nonparticipating nations to demand favorable policies from their governments.

The second line of action has to do with devising and agreeing on safeguards so as to prevent one nation from getting the advantage over another or of interfering in the internal affairs of any nation in matters unrelated to world peace.

Of course the superb book by Grenville Clark and Louis Sohn immediately comes to mind. They have intelligently proposed the necessary amendments for strengthening the United Nations Charter and in a form most convenient for profitable discussions. The name of the book is "World Peace Through World Law."

Our lawyers and parliamentarians are up to this task. Already the American Bar Association and the International Bar Association have made great contributions and are determined to advance steadily.

The third and last line of action I suggest relates to what is known as public relations. The aims of this charter must be sold to people who thirst for peace but are themselves properly skeptical and somewhat disillusioned. The Clark-Sohn recommendations should be discussed widely, especially by women's organizations like the League of Women Voters in my country, by youth groups and by religious bodies everywhere.

Your signature on this charter, fellow parliamentarians, means that you will use your best efforts along these interrelated lines of action, political, legal and public relations. The winds that blow radioactive debris over all the earth will whisk away mere scraps of paper.

Finally, a word about the urgency of action. The massive force of the new weapons is a banal subject. The possibility of the total extinction of the human race bores many people. The human mind rebels at concentrating very long upon the prospect of collective death. Many are comforted by the so-called balance of terror and I, myself, believe that the instinct of self-preservation greatly diminishes the likelihood of intentional atomic war.

The danger, as I see it, is that given our present policies we will certainly stumble into the all-out atomic war. Three nations today have, each of them, enough nuclear power to end human life or at least human civilization. Almost all of these weapons are ready for instant dispatch and detonation. And who controls these myriad delivery systems and detonations? Who but error-prone human beings like you and me, imperfect entities who often make mistakes no matter what precautions are taken. We panic, we get drunk, our minds snap, we miscalculate, we misunderstand, we are misguidedly idealistic.

The real danger for mankind is that an accidental or unauthorized explosion will, perhaps later today even, trigger the all-out war. If not today, in my opinion, sometime soon. Errare est humanum now just as in the days of Rome. The difference is that they didn't have these awesome weapons.

Such an explosion will lend itself to misinterpretation as being the precursor of an attack. There will be no witnesses to interrogate, no twisted wreckage to examine. There will be many pictures on TV and in the papers, stories in the papers and on the radio, driving home the horror and, you may be sure, repeatedly and fearfully raising the question "Is this terrible explosion the first of many?"

An explosion of this sort means instant full alert for our Strategic Air Command for our other Armed Forces. Our intelligence agencies would report to the President forthwith that there was no evidence of it being part of an attack by the Soviet Union. But 20 minutes later or less the Soviet Union will go on maximum alert, just as would the United States were the circumstances reversed and the tensions as critical as they are today. Decision times grow shorter daily. Ballistic missiles, unlike manned bombers, cannot be recalled. There is no way to determine with reasonable certainty the difference between a military alert which is entirely defensive and one which precedes an offensive.

In these times of dread a small match in the form of an accidental or unauthorized nuclear explosion can light the short fuse of disastrous war. The question is this: Are we smart enough to survive? There is much reason for doubt but none for despair. What parent would not readily give up his place in the lifeboat of a sinking ship to save his child? The stakes are no less, but the choice is not yet clear to many parents.

The alternative to one world or peace through law is no world at all for anybody.

Mr. President, as dreamer, skeptic, and parent, I move the adoption of the Charter of Versailles.

CHARTER OF VERSAILLES

The point has been reached in human history when the peoples, parliaments, and governments of the world, must abolish the evil of war, fraught as that evil is with the possibility of the total extinction of the human race.

The peoples, parliaments, and governments of the world must decide to set up a world authority charged with the responsibility of maintaining permanent peace.

The world authority must be endowed with the necessary powers and means to carry out this task.

We, parliamentarians of many nations, met in the Galerie des Batailles in the Palace of Versailles, on this 8th day of September, 1958, dedicate ourselves to this end.

We solemnly promise that, through our parliaments and our governments, we shall seek urgently to realize our aim in order that the men, women, and children of the world may be saved from the destruction which threatens them.

We call upon the prime ministers, foreign secretaries, and governments who accept the principles underlying this policy, to convene a world conference of peoples, parliamentarians, and governments, to consider how there should be established: A world assembly to enact world law in order to secure and maintain permanent peace; an executive to administer these world laws; international courts of justice with compulsory jurisdiction in all matters of dispute concerning these world laws; a world police force to enforce world laws against all those who commit, or threaten to commit, a breach of these world laws, and thus make possible universal, simultaneous, and complete disarmament of all nations.

Views on Immigration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a statement which I presented to the graduate club and ladies' auxiliary of the Phi Delta Epsilon medical fraternity, Washington, D.C.

The statement follows.

Immigration has been a perennial subject of debate in the United States, ever since our Declaration of Independence ascribed a bad immigration policy as one of our reasons for wanting independence from England. This is not surprising, since immigration has been one of the most characteristic and distinctive marks of American history and has contributed enormously to our growth, our wealth, and our international preeminence.

However, I am not unaware that sometimes discussion of immigration palls. The subject has been drowned with a deluge of words. There is none of us who has been intimately concerned with the liberalization of our immigration policy who has not, at one time or another, felt that whatever observations we can make have long since become trite and platitudinous.

But the seriousness of today's struggle for freedom, for the right of people to live in decency and dignity, for liberty from oppression and dictatorship, make it all the more important for us to realize that immigration is a continuing challenge. We cannot afford to become weary of the fight for a decent immigration law. Russia's sputnik and lunik have caused us to lose face in the East-West struggle, and threaten to drive noncommitted nations in today's divided world into the Communist camp. We ignore only at our peril the question of how much face we have been losing for years among these same uncommitted nations because of our American immigration law which announces our belief that other groups of people are more desirable than the very noncommitted peoples whose loyalty to the free West is so sorely needed and so assiduously courted.

A decent and nondiscriminatory American immigration law could be a great secret weapon against the efforts of communism to subvert the uncommitted nations. If we could only see ourselves as others see us, we would not wait a moment to discard the present immigration law and substitute for it one more in keeping with the traditional image of America, the country that pronounced the radical doctrine that all men are born equal, the nation that was never afraid of immigrants and always welcomed them regardless of their national origin, creed, color, or race.

But I am a little ahead of myself. If immigration is important not only to our domestic economy, but also to our international relations—to the critical question of war and peace—what should our immigration policy be? As I see it, after a third of a century of intensive study of the subject, there are three major areas in which our present policy is sadly, nay desperately, in need of major overhaul. To accomplish these ends, I have reintroduced my bill of last year, now numbered H.R. 16. These three major areas are as follows:

I. WHO SHOULD BE ADMITTED INTO THE UNITED STATES?

Under the present law, we look to the national origin or race of the prospective immigrant as the overall criterion of admission. If he comes from some areas of the world, he has carte blanche for admission (subject to some technical health, security and other requirements which I shall not discuss at this point). If the would-be immigrant was born in other areas of the world, he might just as well forget trying to come to this country, because the quotas are so small, and so heavily oversubscribed, that no one but Methuselah will ever be reached in his lifetime.

I believe that what we have to seek to establish at this time is the reassertion in our immigration law of the American principle of equality of opportunity for all, regardless of race, color, or creed. In our present discriminatory immigration law, we also have a time-tested example that such American principle of equality is in our own best interest. The present law applies the discriminatory quota system to Europe, Asia, and Africa, but not to the Western Hemisphere. So, for the past 5 years, an average of 45,828 Mexicans entered this country each year, as against approximately 223,716 from Europe, Asia, and Africa together. I have seen no injury to our Nation from this Mexican immigration, nor has it been a subject of complaint by those who urge immigration restrictions against the rest of the world. I point to this fact merely to show the fallacy of the restrictionists' thinking purportedly based on a pretended homogeneity of the American people.

My bill proposes elimination of the discriminatory features of the present law. Under my proposal, there will be no discrimination based on national origin or race. This will be achieved in my bill by wiping out the present discriminatory national origins quota system, and by substituting a new formula for the distribution of quota visas. In an attempt to make the new quota flexible in order to permit the United States to adjust its intake of immigrants in enlightened self-interest to the fast changing political, economic, and social situation of the world, under my new proposal our annual quota will be distributed among five classes of immigrants without regard to national origin, race, or any results of the U.S. census as follows: (1) Family unification, (2) occupational class, (3) refugee asylum class, (4) national interest class, and (5) resettlement class.

Within each of the five classes, no more than 15 percent of the annual allocation could be issued to inhabitants of any single country. Here is how the annual distribution of the overall immigration quota will be established: Each year the President of the United States, after consulting with the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, and with the Attorney General, would submit to the Congress, prior to March 1, the proposed allocation for each of the five classes, and Congress will have 60 days following the submission of the President's proposal to disapprove it by passing a concurrent resolution. If the proposal is not disapproved by the Congress, it would take effect on the first day of the fiscal year immediately following. If the Congress disagrees with the President, the allocation effective in the preceding fiscal year would automatically become effective.

In order to get the joint executive-legislative responsibility for the annual distribution of the total immigration quota started, I propose that the first presidential allocation plan shall reach the Congress within 6 months immediately following the enactment of my bill and if agreement is not reached on this first presidential proposal, the total annual quota of 250,000 would be simply cut across the board so as to give each of the five classes 20 percent of the total. This interim allocation would, of course, be valid for the first fiscal year of operations, pending the submission of the next presidential proposal which, again, will be subject to congressional disapproval.

My main purpose in proposing this flexible distribution of a permanently fixed annual quota is to permit the President to decide—on a year-to-year basis—with congressional concurrence, whether it is desirable in any particular year to grant more immigrant visas to relatives of U.S. citizens or to, say, refugees, or to, perhaps, immigrants possessing special skills needed in the United States at that particular time, or to any of the other classes.

The 15 percent permanent limitation affecting the participation of any single country in the distribution of the fivefold allocation is, in my opinion, a sufficient guaranty that no unfair distribution of visas for the benefit of inhabitants of one particular country would be practicable.

The history of our immigration legislation since World War II is a clear example of the ineffectiveness of our present national origins law to meet our national and international needs. When the war ended, and displaced persons in camps had to be moved to new homes, our national origins law was a block to all action of substance. Congress had to amend the law to set aside the rigid and discriminatory national origins quota system. When the country wanted to show its gratitude to our GI's, by permitting them to bring in their alien brides, here again our national welfare was frustrated by the national origins law, so Congress had to enact another law to set it aside for this purpose. After the DP Act expired, there was still more to be done with the remaining refugees, and with new escapees from communism, again the national will was thwarted by the national origins requirement, and again Congress had to set that requirement aside for this purpose. The most recent example of how the national origins law prevents us from doing what is right and proper is the Hungarian situation, where an explosion of freedom fighters against communism enabled us to show our traditional humanitarian belief in the right of asylum only through disregard of the provisions of the law, a disregard which was later ratified, in effect, by a special act of Congress which was necessary since the some 30,000 Hungarian freedom fighters would have been barred under our quota laws. Something must clearly be wrong with a law that stands in the way of so many important and critical national objectives, and Congress itself has realized that the national origins system was wrong, but has repealed it only for the specific purposes under consideration.

And while I am on the subject of recent legislation, it is appropriate to say that there are many other eligibility provisions, apart from national origins, which are sorely in need of amendment. Some of these were tinkered with—and I am glad they were—in an act passed in 1957, but much more needs to be done here. Among the matters which need change are the now ancient definitions in the law of insanity and other medical conditions.

II. HOW MANY IMMIGRANTS SHOULD BE ADMITTED INTO THE UNITED STATES?

It is of utmost importance to separate the two questions, "How many immigrants?" and "How should they be selected?" I have already indicated that no matter how many or how few are to be admitted, there should be no numerus clausus. Admission should be in terms of the five criteria I have just outlined.

I believe that our present maximum admission of some 156,000 belittles our faith in the United States and shows distrust of our own stability and strength. I agree with the AFL–CIO that the United States should admit 250,000 quota immigrants each year, and that if we do so this will strengthen and reinvigorate our Nation in precisely the same manner which immigration has always done in our history. I have based this annual quota on the average number of immigrants actually admitted into the United States within the last decade.

Spokesmen against change will move away from its heaviest emphasis on possible subversives, and even away from the argument of inability of southern Europeans to assimilate easily into our culture. The argument is shifting to what will undoubtedly be termed "problems of overpopulation." It will be pointed out that we already have a population of some 170 million; that in about 20 years the population of the United States will increase by some 60 million; that the pattern of large families will continue; that our schools are overcrowded, to put it mildly; that our hospitals are already inadequate for our growing population; that automation is and will continue at accelerating pace to displace American workers; that increased population—either through natural increase or through immigration—will increase demands which, in turn, will increase inflation because productivity will not catch up with such demands.

It will be argued that immigrants almost invariably settle in cities already populated beyond the point of comfort, adding to congestion and, hence, contributing to delinquency. It will be argued that immigrants do not settle on farms where population is decreasing.

These, I believe, will be the main burden of the refrain. These arguments will have to be answered and I maintain that all these assertions can be rationally met. In general, these various arguments against change of the national origins formula come from the prophets of doom and express the view that this is the best possible world and that any change means catastrophe. This same sort of argument has been advanced against all forward-looking and liberal proposals and has invariably proved to be false and unwarranted. I am convinced the same will prove true here.

III. WHAT GOVERNMENT AGENCY SHALL EXERCISE JURISDICTION OVER IMMIGRATION?

Under the present law, we have a two-headed system where officials of the Department of State issue visas to both immigrants and nonimmigrants abroad, while officials of the Department of Justice determine at ports of entry whether the holders of visas are admissible to the United States. This is an antiquated, cumbersome, and expensive system. It creates anxiety and uncertainty in the minds of the immigrants and nonimmigrants alike, and it causes friction between two governmental agencies operating independently in the same field and stepping on each other's toes.

Under my proposal, the entire administration of our immigration and nationality laws will be placed in the hands of a Director of Bureau of Immigration and Citizenship, who will be an Assistant Attorney General, subject to confirmation by the Senate. His officers, acting as immigration attachés, will be stationed at our consulates abroad and will issue immigrant and nonimmigrant visas after a finding is made that the recipient of a visa is found to be eligible actually to enter the United States.

In addition to simplification of procedures and elimination of dual standards, as well as uncertainty in the minds of immigrants or foreign visitors, my proposal will automatically open visa issuance to administrative review in the Department of Justice by the well-qualified and trusted Board of Immigration Appeals. The issuance of diplomatic visas will, of course, remain a function of diplomatic officers of the Department of State.

I believe that the administrative system which I propose will not only provide for a more efficient and more equitable issuance of visas abroad, but that it will also bring a great saving to the American taxpayer.

So much for what I believe to be the heart of our immigration policy; namely (1), our quota system, and (2) jurisdiction over immigration. There is much more in my bill that is new and desirable. Wives, husbands, and minor children of United States citizens will continue to be admitted as nonquota immigrants, but I have added to the nonquota class parents of United States citizens and professors of academic schools. In the naturalization portion of the law, my bill will not tolerate classification of United States citizens into two categories: native-born and naturalized. There will be no additional grounds for loss of U.S. citizenship by naturalized citizens except those that apply to native-born citizens.

My bill would eliminate all retroactive application of grounds for deportation and humanize all the unduly harsh provisions applicable in exclusion. We should humanize the provisions relating to suspension of deportation, through removing the present extremely harsh eligibility requirement, and enact the provisions of my bill designed to prevent the separation of families.

IV. WHAT WE SHOULD NOT DO

I would like to discuss with you one final problem which the Congress will face this year: a very bad and unwholesome bill which is being pressed for enactment. It flies in the face of a provision of my bill which provides for what is basic to our American concept of fairness and decency, a full and unlimited judicial review of administrative decision in all immigration proceedings, including rulings on deportation and exclusion. Contrary to this basic concept of American law, a bill (H.R. 13311) was rushed through the House of Representatives last year, designed and intended to curtail judicial review of deportation and exclusion orders. That bill has been reintroduced this year, and effort will be made to push it through. The bill would prevent aliens from seeking judicial review in the Federal district court, and compel them, generally speaking, to go to distant courts of appeal, which are fewer in number. Thus, review can now be had in 94 courts; under that bill, it would be limited to only 11 courts. The court of appeals is what its name indicates, a higher court which normally hears appeals from lower courts. Litigation in the appellate courts is normally more expensive, both in terms of legal fees and expenses. Furthermore, the bill specifically denies to aliens the rights to obtain declaratory judgments in certain cases, although the Supreme Court of the United States twice ruled that under current law aliens are entitled to this remedy. The bill also restricts the rights of persons who claim to be citizens to litigate their claim. And there are a wide variety of other ways, most of them technical, but highly important in terms of substantive rights, in which this bill would seriously handicap the presently available rights of aliens and citizens to obtain judicial protection against illegal, capricious, and arbitrary action of Government officials.

I testified against this bill; so did the American Bar Association, the Association of Immigration and Nationality Lawyers, and the Immigration Committee of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia. In addition, the American Council of Voluntary Agencies for Foreign Service, Inc., through its Committee on Migration and Refugee Problems, which consists of 20 of the major religious and social agencies working in the immigration field, deplored the bill's effect and urged against enactment. That distinguished body of representatives of the American people warned the Congress that instead of simplifying the process as is the alleged purpose of this bill, it might in fact increase the number of cases on the court calendars.

As a result of statistics provided me by the Commissioner of Immigration, at my request—figures which, by the way had not even been compiled previously—it is perfectly clear that the bill is not only dangerous but quite unnecessary. When I asked for a list of cases which justified so drastic a remedy as proposed in the bill, I was given 7 cases extending over the last 5 years. Imagine, just 7 cases out of a total of many, many tens of thousands which were under consideration during the 5-year period, and yet they would junk a time-honored protection for judicial review! The truth of the matter is that less and less cases are getting into court anyway, and there is no reasonable justification for the bill. It would be like putting all sick people in jail, simply because there may be one or two typhoid Marys around.

After all, judicial review of illegal administrative action is not a matter of grace conferred upon an alien; rather it is a mark of the highest civilization in according equality before the law. Deportation of an alien means banishment from all that may be dear to him. We must not forget that in immigration we deal with human beings, not inanimate or senseless things. An alien or a citizen deprived of the right of judicial review is cut off from protecting his way of life, his very existence. I sincerely hope that the Congress will reject any such unjustified, unwarranted, and unnecessary tampering with fundamental principles upon which our entire jurisprudence is founded.

Immigration is a large and controversial subject. But I would be less than candid if I were to leave you with the impression that a bill such as mine, which I believe to be moderate and reasonable and in our best national interest, will have easy sledding. I am not clairvoyant and do not presume to know what Congress will do. But I do know what is unfavorable and what is favorable in the climate which could or could not produce changes in the immigration law. I know that approximately two-thirds of the Congress are against change; particularly, they are opposed to any change in the national origins system.

Nevertheless, one of the hopeful signs of the times is the most recent Gallup poll on immigration which showed that although really very few Americans knew or understood this problem, where they did, they were largely opposed to the present law and in favor of major overhauling of it. This gives us the key to action. A democracy cannot thrive in the ignorance of its people. This subject is far too important to be relegated to senseless name calling, the heat of passion instead of the light of reason, and lethargy. The three major religious faiths of this country have demanded substantial liberalization. Organized labor has done likewise. If the proponents of liberalized immigration laws do their homework, carry their message to the people throughout the length and breadth of the land, and encourage the widest possible discussion and debate of this subject, I am morally certain that we will at least start the ball rolling toward an immigration law that will do honor to us and proclaim to the world at large that we have an effective and working democracy.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Most gracious Lord, whose mercy endureth forever, with reverent tread we pause at this wayside shrine of devotion, reared so long ago at the Nation's birth by the architects of our freedom.

We come in the faith of our fathers, the faith that still lives, as we entrust our all to the Father God of whom our souls sing, with an assurance nothing can disturb, "He holds the whole world in His hand."

Give us to vividly realize that there is no righteousness which does not engirdle the globe, and that the span and strength of a nation's life are measured by its moral stamina.

Grant us the pity which stoops to serve, and the abiding peace which passeth understanding.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 27, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

REPORT ON MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Transmitted herewith is the Fourteenth Semiannual Report on the Operations of the Mutual Security Program for the period ending June 30, 1958. The report was prepared by the Department of State with participation by the Department of Defense, International Cooperation Administration, and the Development Loan Fund.

The need for economic growth among the underdeveloped countries continues to be of paramount importance to the enlightened self-interest of the economically developed nations, especially our own.

In recent years the rising social and economic aspirations of the free world's less fortunate peoples have been seized upon by the Communists as fertile ground in which to accomplish what they have successfully been deterred from achieving by military aggression. Accordingly, the mutual security program, now more than ever, offers the most economically effective means of blunting and turning back this latest Communist challenge.

Military and economic assistance under the mutual security program permit the underdeveloped countries to maintain their own share of the free world's common defense. The deterrent to aggression thus created also provides the essential opportunity for political stability and internal economic development—prerequisites to resisting the blandishments of the Communists.

REPORT OF INTERAGENCY COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL SURPLUS DISPOSAL—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the ninth semiannual report on activities carried on under Public Law 480, 83d Congress, as amended, outlining operations under the act during the period July 1 through December 31, 1958.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 28, 1959.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of title 15, section 1024(a), United States Code, the Speaker had appointed Mr. PATMAN, of Texas, Mr. BOLLING, of Missouri, Mr. BOGGS, of Louisiana, Mr. REUSS, of Wisconsin, Mr. CURTIS, of Missouri, Mr. KILBURN, of New York, and Mr. WIDNALL, of New Jersey, as members of the Joint Economic Committee on the part of the House.

The message announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 57) providing that the two Houses of Congress commemorate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, later in the day, after the morning hour, we expect to have the Senate consider Calendar No. 2, Senate Resolution 41, to pay compensation for a certain period to employees of former Senator John D. Hoblitzell, Jr.; Calendar No. 3, Senate Resolution 36, authorizing the revision and printing of the Senate Manual for the use of the 86th Congress; Calendar No. 4, Senate Resolution 37, to print the 60th Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended April 1, 1957, as a Senate document; Calendar No. 5, Senate Resolution 38, to pay a gratuity to Laura Leceta Sadler; Calendar No. 6, Senate Resolution 39, to pay a gratuity to Lucy Dodson; Calendar No. 7, Senate Resolution 40, to pay a gratuity to Virginia T. Meador; and Calendar No. 8, Senate Resolution No. 34, authorizing additional funds for the Official Reporters of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. MAGNUSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Ross A. Gilmore, and sundry other persons, for permanent appointment in the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and Claude H. Broach, and sundry other persons, for appointment in the United States Coast Guard.

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance:

T. Graydon Upton, of Pennsylvania, to be an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury;

Dana Latham, of California, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue;

Donald A. Maginnis, Jr., of Louisiana, to be Comptroller of Customs, with headquarters at New Orleans; and William L. Mitchell, of the District of Columbia, to be Commissioner of Social Security of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, vice Charles Irwin Schottland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further reports of committees, the nominations on the Executive Calendar will be stated.

NOMINATION OF LAMPTON BERRY TO BE AMBASSADOR TO CEYLON

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I am very much pleased to commend to the Senate the Honorable Lampton Berry, a native of my State. He is well qualified by training and experience for the very important post of Ambassador to Ceylon. I urge that his nomination be confirmed.

During the past several years, I have had considerable opportunity to learn of his outstanding work in a number of important positions both in our State Department here in Washington, and in consular positions to which he has previously been assigned by our Government. It is indeed commendable that our Government conducts diplomatic relations with our foreign neighbors through men of high character, dedication to service, and devotion to fundamental American principles. Mr. Berry possesses all these qualities, fortified by years of training, understanding, and knowledge gained through everyday experience for a period of 25 years.

Mr. Berry has devoted his life to the Foreign Service of the United States. He was born in Columbia, Mississippi, and spent his early life in that State. He attended the University of Mississippi, where he majored in political science and later served as an instructor. All Mississippians are proud of his achievements.

In 1934 Mr. Berry began his career with the Department of State, and since that time has performed his professional duties with a high degree of efficiency and tremendous success.

Because of the considerable time he has spent in posts at Calcutta and New Delhi, as well as other posts of importance from Capetown to Singapore, Mr. Berry is eminently qualified to serve as our Ambassador to Ceylon. It is a pleasure and high privilege for me to give this personal word of recommendation. I urge that his nomination be confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about two of the nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service, particularly that of Richard B. Wigglesworth, of Massachusetts, to be U.S. Ambassador to Canada.

Richard Wigglesworth was formerly my colleague in the House of Representatives, and, I believe, formerly a colleague of the minority leader, as well, in that body.

Richard Wigglesworth is a distinguished man. He has been appointed to a sensitive post. He represents a middle ground between the professional career officer and a businessman or layman placed in a diplomatic post.

Former Representative Wigglesworth is a man of high character and unusual attainments; and he will give a very fine account of himself in his new post. I wish the RECORD to show that, and to carry our congratulations to our new Ambassador upon his present eminence.

Mr. President, I also wish to state for the record a brief word of congratulation in regard to Henry A. Byroade, of Indiana, whose nomination to be U.S. Ambassador to Afghanistan has now been confirmed, as I knew him when he was an army colonel in Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next nomination on the calendar will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Livingston T. Merchant, of the District of Columbia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John O. Bell, of Maryland, to be a Special Assistant for Mutual Security Coordination in the Department of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Leonard J. Saccio, of Connecticut, to be Deputy Director of the International Cooperation Administration in the Department of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Harry A. Bullis, of Minnesota, to be Chairman of the International Development Advisory Board for a term of 2 years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of George C. Lodge, of Massachusetts, to be an Assistant Secretary of Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL HOUSING COMMISSION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Julian H. Zimmerman, of Kansas, to be Federal Housing Commissioner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of New York, to be a member of the National Mediation Board for the term expiring February 1962.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for routine service in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Health Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of all these nominations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

PROPOSED DONATION BY NAVY DEPARTMENT OF BOATS TO NAVAL CADET CORPS

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy (Material), reporting, pursuant to law, that the Department of the Navy proposes to donate a 104-foot aircraft rescue boat, and a 56-foot LCC, to the Naval Cadet Corps, Alexandria, Va.; to the Committee on Armed Services.

AUDIT REPORT ON FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, an audit report on the Federal Housing Administration, Housing and Home Finance Agency, fiscal years 1954–57 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

AMENDMENTS OF FEDERAL AVIATION ACT OF 1958

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 in order to (1) assure for the Civil Aeronautics Board independent participation and representation in court proceedings, (2) provide for review of nonhearing Board determinations in the courts of appeals, and (3) clarify present provisions concerning the time for seeking judicial review (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 to authorize the Civil Aeronautics Board to include in certificates of public convenience and necessity limitations on the type and extent of service authorized, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to authorize elimination of a hearing in certain cases under section 408 (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A letter from the Chairman, Civil Aeronautics Board, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to authorize the imposition of civil penalties in certain cases; and to increase the monetary amount of fines for violation of the criminal provisions (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PROPOSED LABOR-MANAGEMENT PRACTICES ACT OF 1959

A letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation providing further safeguards against improper practices in labor organizations and in labor-management relations; requiring disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and their officers and agents and reports of direct and indirect dealings between them and employers which may conflict with obligations as employee representatives; reinforcing rights of members of labor organizations with respect to funds and property, the election and removal of officers, and the exercise by other labor organizations of supervisory control, of such organizations; providing penalties for certain criminal acts; and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

REPORTS ON POSITIONS FILLED IN CERTAIN GRADES OF CLASSIFICATION ACT OF 1949

A letter from the Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on positions filled under the Classification Act of 1949, in grades GS–16, 17, and 18 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on positions filled under the Classification Act of 1949, in grades GS–16, 17, and 18 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on positions filled under the Classification Act of 1949, in grades GS–16, 17, and 18 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

RESOLUTION OF OKLAHOMA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my distinguished senior colleague, the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], I present for appropriate reference, an enrolled House Resolution No. 507 of the Oklahoma State Legislature, memorializing the Congress not to preempt the fuels-tax field in connection with the proposed tax increase on gasoline and fuels.

There being no objection, the resolution was received, referred to the Committee on Finance, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENROLLED HOUSE RESOLUTION 507

Resolution declaring it to be the sense of the house of representatives that the Federal gasoline tax should not be increased, expressing the hope that it will not be, and directing that this resolution be forwarded to the Oklahoma congressional delegation

Whereas the President of the United States has proposed to the National Congress an increase in the Federal gasoline tax of 1½ cents per gallon; and

Whereas this is one of the few areas of taxation still available to the sovereign States; and

Whereas such an increase would further burden the transportation and other industries and result in higher cost to the consumer of all goods transported on our highways and would ultimately add to the inflation of our economy; and

Whereas said tax increase would also have a detrimental effect on the oil industry and gasoline retailers as well as costing the general public additional millions and during the recent election the present national administration took credit for an expanded national highway program while holding out to the people the hope of lower taxes, such a tax increase would amount to a breach of faith with the public by said Eisenhower administration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the 27th Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, That the membership of the house express their hope that there will be no further invasion of their rightful area of taxation by the Federal Government and that the vital industries which would be affected by this tax will not be further burdened and the tax paying public will be spared a tax increase on such a basic necessity to our economy; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Oklahoma congressional delegation.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 15th day of January 1959.

CLINT G. LIVINGSTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF CHOSEN FREEHOLDERS, MORRIS COUNTY, N.J.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Morris, N.J., concerning the Post Office Department's cancellation of mail handling contracts with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Morris that the Post Office Department is contemplating the cancellation of its present contracts with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad for handling mail in those parts of New Jersey served by the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad; and

Whereas it is contemplated that this mail, previously handled by the railroad, will be distributed by trucks using the already crowded highways in the metropolitan area of New Jersey; and

Whereas the contemplated cancellation of the mail contract will result in a financial loss to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad which is already experiencing some grave financial problems of operation, and

Whereas it is in the vital interests of the County of Morris, as well as many municipalities that are served by the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, that said railroad remain in a sound financial condition so as to serve this county and its communities; as well as to serve the Nation as part of a railroad network valuable to national defense; and

Whereas it has always been the policy of the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Morris to urge the full use of the existing facilities of the railroad for passenger and freight transportation and, to that extent, relieve the already overburdened highway facilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Morris:

1. That the Post Office Department of the Federal Government be, and it is hereby, respectfully urged to reconsider its program for canceling the present mail contract with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad in the interest of continuing to make full use of the existing facilities of the railroad and thus help to preserve the financial integrity of the railroad so that it can continue to serve the county of Morris and its municipalities that are served by said railroad, whose economies are closely associated with and dependent upon the soundness and operation of the railroad, and so that the railroad facilities can be maintained in good order as a vital link in the nationwide transportation network in the interests of national defense.

In addition, the continuance of the mail contracts with the railroad is urged so as to avoid the possibility of further overburdening the highway facilities in the northern New Jersey area.

2. That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded to the following: Postmaster General of the United States; United States Senator Clifford P. Case: United States Senator Harrison Williams; United States Representative Peter Frelinghuysen, Jr.; Gov. Robert B. Meyner; State Senator Thomas J. Hillery; State Assemblyman Benjamin Franklin III; State Assemblyman Joseph J. Maraziti; and Mr. Perry Shoemaker, president, D.L. & W. RR.

I hereby certify the above to be a true copy of a resolution adopted by the Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Morris at a regular meeting held January 14, 1959.

HELEN A. MUNSON,
Clerk.

RESOLUTION OF WAGE TAX PROTEST LEAGUE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Wage Tax Protest League of New Jersey opposing the adoption of legislation to require various Government agencies to deduct municipal taxes or any non-Federal taxes from the salaries of Federal employees.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE WAGE TAX PROTEST LEAGUE OF NEW JERSEY, INC., DECEMBER 10, 1958

Whereas the city of Philadelphia will endeavor to induce the 86th Congress of the United States to enact legislation requiring the Federal Government to deduct municipal income, wage, or occupational license taxes from the salaries of Federal employees who may be liable for such taxes; and

Whereas there exists in the United States a veritable tax jungle of municipal assessments against individual incomes; and

Whereas there is no uniform method of assessing these taxes, thereby making the collection by Government agencies an unwarranted and expensive burden on the taxpayers of the United States; and

Whereas the cost of deduction relative to a city such as Pittsburgh, Pa., having the reciprocity feature in its tax would have a high administrative cost; and

Whereas in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., with no reciprocity feature, the citizen is placed in conflict with States rights versus the Bill of Rights, the Government of the United States is placed in the unfortunate position of being powerless to protect the rights of the citizen as guaranteed under the Bill of Rights and is exposed to rampant localism; and

Whereas this situation is being resolved at the present time in a petition for certiorari before the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of Thompson v. Lennox, Sheriff of the City of Philadelphia; also in the case of Geiger v. United States Civil Service Commissioners and the Secretary of the Navy before the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C.; and lastly, by the case of Fries, Kellogg and Devine v. Lennox, Sheriff of the City of Philadelphia, now pending before the U.S. District Court in Philadelphia, Pa.; and

Whereas the State of New Jersey recognizes the supremacy of the U.S. Government in the deduction of income taxes and old-age benefits but does not forbid the deduction of municipal taxes by employers of the State of New Jersey; and

Whereas we believe the Federal Government should be above certain menial tasks, such as in this case, serving as tax collector for sundry municipal subdivisions of the various States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Wage Tax Protest League of New Jersey, Inc., at its regular monthly meeting in Oaklyn, N.J., on December 10, 1958, That this organization strongly urges the Congress of the United States to forego the passage of any legislation to require the various Government agencies to deduct municipal taxes or any non-Federal taxes from the salaries of Federal employees.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Texas:

S. 727. A bill for the relief of Dr. Ramon C. Taliavera; and

S. 728. A bill for the relief of Dr. Tremaine Edmund Heffler; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILEY:

S. 729. A bill for the relief of Walter A. Denning; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. WILEY (for himself, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. YARBOROUGH, and Mr. ENGLE):

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN DENTAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, August 3 will mark the 100th anniversary of the American Dental Association. That association, which represents more than 85 percent of the doctors of dentistry in the United States, has made a great many contributions to the improvement of the dental health of our people. Because of its constant and intelligent efforts to further advance progress in that field and because of the always gracious and cooperative attitude which its representatives evince with respect to proposed legislation involving dental health, I believe it very much in order for the Congress to extend its felicitations and best wishes to the American Dental Association on the occasion of its centennial.

Therefore, Mr. President, for myself and 75 of my colleagues, I hereby submit, for appropriate reference, a resolution extending congratulations and best wishes to the Dental Association.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7), submitted by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. HILL, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. CARLSON, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. COOPER, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DIRKSEN, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GREEN, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. HART, Mr. HARTKE, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. JORDAN, Mr. KEATING, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERR, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LANGER, Mr. LAUSCHE, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MARTIN, Mr. McCARTHY, Mr. McCLELLAN, Mr. McGEE, Mr. McNAMARA, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MORTON, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WILEY, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota), was received and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

Whereas the American Dental Association, representing more than 85 percent of the Nation's dentists, has for one hundred years been effective in advancing the art and science of dentistry and extending their benefits to more and more people; and

Whereas the dental health care available to the people of the United States is superior to any in the world; and

Whereas the high level of dental education in the United States has enabled American dentists to prevent as well as treat and control dental disease; and

Whereas the dental profession of the United States has sponsored scientific research which has produced many outstanding results designed to improve the health, comfort, and appearance of all citizens; and

Whereas further research will be enhanced by construction of the new building for the National Institute of Dental Research at Bethesda, Maryland, which was vigorously supported in the Congress by the American Dental Association; and

Whereas the dentists of the United States have achieved worldwide recognition for their contributions to improved health; and

Whereas the American Dental Association is observing its centennial during the year 1959, the actual date of organization being August 3, 1859: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the felicitations and best wishes of the Congress of the United States are hereby cordially extended to the American Dental Association on its many and varied contributions to the health of the people and upon the occasion of the one-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the association.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A FOREIGN SERVICE ACADEMY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], and the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], I introduce a bill to provide for a U.S. Foreign Service Academy.

The proposed legislation would establish and maintain an Academy for the instruction and training of diplomatic cadets as preparation for service as officers in the Foreign Service. Under the direction of the Secretary of State, the Academy would provide training comparable educationally to post-graduate work in the Nation's colleges.

I am aware, of course, that other Senators have introduced proposed legislation taking a different approach to sharpening up our Foreign Service. In view of the generally recognized need for as effective a program as possible, I hope that each of these proposals will be given fair and thorough consideration.

I am aware, too, that in the past the State Department has not been enthusiastic about this type of approach to our needs in this field.

Over the years the Department has made a real effort to adequately equip our men and women abroad in the Foreign Service, through its Foreign Service Institute.

Nevertheless, in these challenging days—particularly in view of the East-West crisis—we face real and growing challenges in diplomacy, as well as in other fields. That is why I am hopeful that this approach to providing an even higher caliber foreign service will receive early and serious attention. The purpose, of course, is to better train and equip those who are serving us abroad as "images" of the United States. The curriculum of such an Academy would, of course, need to be developed by experts in the field.

If we can avoid a third world war—as we hope and pray will be possible—we recognize that more and more of our interests, both now and in the future, will need to be protected around the conference table.

I shall, therefore, urge my colleagues on the Foreign Relations Committee to give this measure early and favorable consideration.

Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 730) to provide for the establishment of a U.S. Foreign Service Academy, introduced by Mr. WILEY (for himself, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. YARBOROUGH, and Mr. ENGLE), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "United States Foreign Service Academy Act".

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to establish and maintain, in or near the District of Columbia, a United States Foreign Service Academy (hereinafter referred to as the "Academy") for the instruction and training of diplomatic cadets in preparation for service as officers in the Foreign Service of the United States.

SEC. 3. (a) The Academy shall be under the general supervision of the Director General of the Foreign Service Institute and under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe.

(b) The course of instruction and training for diplomatic cadets at the Academy shall be prescribed by the Secretary of State and shall be the equivalent of the curriculum prescribed by accredited colleges and universities as a prerequisite to the granting of a master's degree. Upon satisfactory completion of the prescribed course of instruction and training, diplomatic cadets shall be granted a master's degree.

(c) The Secretary of State may appoint or assign such officers and civilian instructors as the needs of the Academy require.

SEC. 4. (a) The corps of diplomatic cadets shall consist of such individuals as may be selected and admitted to the Academy upon competitive entrance examinations as prescribed by the Secretary of State.

(b) Diplomatic cadets while in attendance at the Academy shall be entitled to quarters and subsistence.

SEC. 5. There shall be appointed each year a Board of Visitors to the Academy which shall consist of five members from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and five members from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the respective chairmen of such committees. The Board of Visitors shall exercise the same functions and be entitled to the same expense allowance as is provided in the case of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy.

SEC. 6. Each diplomatic cadet selected for admission to the Academy shall sign an agreement that, unless sooner separated, he will—

(1) complete the course of instruction at the Academy; and

(2) accept an appointment and service, as an officer in the Foreign Service for at least the three years immediately following the granting of his degree from the Academy.

SEC. 7. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

EXTENSION OF CERTAIN TRAINEESHIP PROVISIONS OF HEALTH AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1956

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in 1956 the Congress brought into existence two new and most important programs in the field of health services. One of these led to the inauguration of a program for the graduate training of professional public health personnel. A second inaugurated a program for the advanced training of professional nurses. At that time, in favorably reporting the legislation to the Senate, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare pointed out that from a high of over 900 persons trained in public health in 1947 there had been a startling and shocking drop to only 400 persons trained in 1955. This was true even in the face of a greatly increased demand for personnel trained to meet the health requirements of a growing population, to put new research discoveries into operation and to resolve such altogether new problems in the field of public health as those involving air pollution and the disposal of radioactive waste products. At the same time, the committee reported to the Senate that the Nation was faced by an acute shortage of nurses qualified by advanced training to fill key administrative and supervisory positions in over 6,000 hospitals and 4,000 public health nursing agencies.

The programs which we then devised in an attempt to help cope with these situations we regarded as experimental. They were limited in duration to 3 years, and the Congress wisely provided that before the 3 years were up the Surgeon General would be required to call conferences broadly representative of the groups interested in and informed about the training of public health and nursing personnel. Those conferences were to be charged with the responsibility of carefully reviewing the effectiveness of the traineeship programs, evaluating their worth, and recommending to the Congress as to the desirability of continuing, modifying, or abolishing the traineeship programs. Those conferences have been held, Mr. President, and both conference groups have reported their findings and recommendations to the Congress. The conferees, I am very happy to state, were unanimous in declaring that the programs had proved most effective, had brought a halt to the shocking decline in the numbers of people seeking advanced training in these essential fields and had effectively initiated a reversal of that untoward trend. The conferees were unanimous in recommending that the programs be continued and broadened. The conferees complimented the Congress for its prescience in initiating these programs and expressed the hope that, in view of their having so documented the values of these programs to the country, the Congress would be prompt to extend them.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the report of the conference on public health training and excerpts from the report of the conference on professional nurse traineeships be set forth in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1 and 2.)

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I believe that every Member of the Congress who reads these reports will share my feeling of pride in the work we did when we brought these two programs into being and my desire that we insure their continuance.

Under these programs, more than a thousand individuals were trained in public health during the fiscal years of 1957 and 1958. More than 1,800 graduate nurses have received advanced training. Despite this fine result, and although, as I have said, we have brought the decline in enrollment to a halt, nevertheless, because of the growth of population and the multiplicity of new health problems now confronting us, we are not only not keeping pace with the constantly expanding need for such highly trained personnel, but we are even losing ground. These programs, Mr. President, must be continued, and they must be increased in size. Should we fail to do this, the cost to the country will be incalculably greater than the expenditure which their continuance will entail. It is for these reasons and with this understanding, Mr. President, that I send to the desk a bill calling for the extension of these two valuable programs for an additional 5 years and providing that before their expiration the Surgeon General shall again see to it that an impartial and expert group review their operations and report thereon to the Congress with such recommendations concerning them as it may then see fit to make.

The bill I am introducing, Mr. President, calls for the simple extension of each program for 5 years. The reports to the Congress by the two conference groups contain suggestions and recommendations for certain changes in each program. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare will, before reporting this bill to the Senate, give very careful consideration to those recommendations. We shall, of course, consult with members of both conference groups. Prompt enactment of this bill is important.

EXHIBIT 1

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PUBLIC HEALTH TRAINING TO THE SURGEON GENERAL OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE, WASHINGTON, D.C., JULY 28–30, 1958

I. INTRODUCTION

Congress in the past 10 years has appropriated many billions of dollars for improving the health of the Nation. A considerable proportion of this has been to develop new knowledge and technology for health protection. The application of new discoveries in public health programs will contribute toward reducing the threat of cancer, arthritis, heart disease, dental disease, tuberculosis, venereal diseases, poliomyelitis, mental disorders, and other illnesses, as well as hazards arising from our increasingly complex environment.

But some, if not most, of these preventive programs have not developed to their full potential. Effective action against each disease requires a complex group of skills and the technical knowledge of specialized physicians, laboratory specialists, dentists, nurses, sanitarians, engineers, biostatisticians, health educators, nutritionists, social scientists, and many others.

In title I of the Health Amendments Act of 1956 Congress recognized that these programs have lagged because adequate personnel with the necessary specialized advanced training have not been available to provide needed services. The critical nature of this shortage was noted in the statesmanlike reports on the act submitted on May 29, 1956, by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and on July 2, 1956, by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The former report noted the startling and shocking drop that cut in half the annual number of public health trainees between 1947 and 1955. Congress passed the Health Amendments Act of 1956, title I of which authorized the Public Health Service to establish a program of traineeships for graduate or specialized public health training for professional health personnel, such as physicians, nurses, sanitary engineers, nutritionists, medical social workers, dentists, health educators, veterinarians, sanitarians, and others whose professional skills are required in modern public health practice. The legislation specified that between June 30, 1958, and December 1, 1958, the Surgeon General should call a conference broadly representative of the professional and training groups interested in and informed about training of professional public health personnel.

Under this congressional mandate the National Conference on Public Health Training was held in Washington, D.C., on July 28, 29, and 30, 1958. It was charged with: (1) Appraising the effectiveness of the program in meeting needs for trained public health personnel; (2) considering modifications in the basic legislation, if any, which may be desirable to increase its effectiveness; and (3) considering the most effective distribution of responsibilities between Federal and State Governments with respect to the administration and support of public health training.

Those who attended the conference at the invitation of the Surgeon General included representatives of State and local health departments, graduate schools of public health, schools of nursing, other university departments, medical schools, research institutions, hospitals, foundations contributing to health programs, medical departments of industry, and voluntary health agencies. In preparation for the national conference, numerous State meetings on public health training were held and their results and recommendations made available to the national conference.

In further preparation for the conference, a mass of data on personnel and training needs and training resources was assembled from all States and Territories, from local health departments, from teaching institutions throughout the country, from voluntary health organizations, and other agencies. This information, compiled in a source book and supplement, was forwarded to the conferees several weeks in advance and was individually studied and analyzed by the conferees before the conference. At the time of the conference, the source book and supplement were accepted as the basic data upon which the conference should proceed.

The conference was divided into four groups which studied all the comprehensive reports that were made available, and reached independent conclusions on each phase of the study. This close scrutiny was necessary to be sure that the estimates constituted the hard core of real need. The four groups pooled their findings in reaching the final conclusions and recommendations.

The conference found that the data indicate a serious deficiency in the training of many currently employed personnel and document the areas of need for additional adequately qualified personnel to develop the specific health programs authorized by Congress and other public bodies. At the beginning of this year, for example, in official public health agencies alone, there were well over 2,500 vacancies in professional categories due to lack of trained personnel.

In addition, because of this shortage of trained personnel, many positions have been filled during the past several years with inadequately trained people. As a result, over 20,000 professional workers now employed by governmental and voluntary health agencies do not have the formal specialized training they need to provide for the people the health protection made possible by today's technology.

To these 22,500 people who need training for today's health programs, there must be added 6,100 more specialized, trained professional workers who, it is conservatively estimated, will be needed for the inevitable expansion of the next 5 years to meet demands for service due to population growth and new health hazards. These estimates of needs for the immediate future are especially significant. Equally important is the conclusion of the conference that just over the horizon are needs in health and health-related programs which have not been formulated or have been incompletely developed by State or local health departments. One such field is that of radiation and health. Very little is known about the scope, the threat, and the hope that radiation knowledge may bring for human health. A second field is the changing health hazards incident to our rapidly developing industrial technology. The shifting patterns of the environment in which we work and live in both urban and rural areas further add to the growing complexity of maintaining public health protection. No one can more than speculate on the future extent of the needs for qualified people in such changing fields. Just as even the most ambitious automobile of electrical industry executive of 1910 in his wildest dream would not have come close to estimating the needs in his profession 20 years ahead, so the public health administrators who have submitted their estimates have kept their feet firmly on the ground of present known and demonstrable need. That fact alone adds urgency to their recommendations. The public health agencies are not staffed as they should be now. Much less are they prepared for even the known hazards that lie ahead. The above is but an indication of the facts upon which the conference based its recommendations.

II. EVALUATION OF THE TITLE I TRAINING PROGRAM

What has been the effect of the program authorized by Congress under title I? The experience of only 2 years has indicated the soundness of the basic principle upon which Congress acted.

The conference, after thoroughly canvassing the operations of title I, noted the following six points as indicative of the effectiveness of the program:

1. More than 1,000 individuals were trained in public health during the fiscal years 1957 and 1958 under title I. Over half of this number were staff level public health nurses. Health educators, physicians, sanitary engineers, and sanitarians were the next most numerous groups in the order mentioned. They accounted for about 30 percent of the persons trained. At the time of the report, information had been received concerning the employment status or plans of 905 of the 1,000 trainees. Of this number, 818 were working or had definite plans to work in public health. The employment plans of 72 had not yet been firmly established, and only 15 were working or planned to work in scientific pursuits in private industry, in private medical practice, or outside the health field. Most of the first-year trainees who had returned to work in health agencies had already assumed positions of greater responsibility. Almost 100 percent of the employers who had observed the job performance noted changes in the quality, scope, or effectiveness of the employee's work that were attributable, at least in part, to the training received.

2. The existence of the Federal program has stimulated concurrent State training programs. Title I has proven a catalyst, not a substitute for local initiative. Support of academic training by States showed a slight increase in 1957 and a further substantial gain of 25 percent in 1958. State health officers report that the title I program has increased general interest in the field of public health and aroused active interest in training among public health employees. The existence of such professional opportunities has helped improve morale and work performance in health agencies.

3. Title I has reversed a serious downward trend in the number of persons receiving public health training which began in 1947 and dropped more sharply in 1952. For the first time since 1951 the number of trainees in public health supported by State and local health authorities has increased. This increase has been stimulated and supplemented by title I. For the first time in many years we are gaining ground.

4. Nevertheless, the number who have been trained is still too small. The backlog of known current need for training runs over 20,000. Sixteen years would be required to fill that gap with present programs, even if there were no personnel turnover, no increase in population, and no needs for service.

5. The conference has been impressed with the manner in which the Public Health Service has administered this program. It finds that the method of administration of traineeship awards by the Public Health Service is eminently satisfactory. There are administrative details which need to be worked out on the basis of experience, but there is no sign of any large problems, conflicts, or differences between the Public Health Service, State and local governments, and the training institutions. Exceptional judgment has been exercised in the selection of trainees. Care has been taken in the analysis of their qualifications, and high standards have been maintained throughout the program. Moreover, there is opportunity for further progress. Over twice as many applicants have applied for training as there were traineeships available—and this despite the limitations noted below, which have tended to reduce the number of applicants.

6. The conference finds that in the administration of title I, the Public Health Service, upon recommendation of the National Advisory Committee on Title I Traineeships, adopted a very conservative policy, wise in the formative, experimental period of such a program. An age limitation made training available primarily to those under 35 years. As a result of the particular emphasis placed on the recruitment of new personnel, more than half the trainees were new to the field of public health. With rare exceptions, only those who had no previous public health academic training or less than 5 years of public health experience were admitted. The duration of training was limited to 1 year. Each of these administrative restrictions was necessary because of the limited funds available under the title I program, but each left broad areas of unmet need. In addition, this program was not designed to meet many of the other types of training needs that are of great importance to public health. There has been increasing recognition that continuation of these conservative policies will further impede the development of necessary public health programs, and the conference has made definite recommendations designed to correct these deficiencies.

III. RECOMMENDATIONS

The conference concludes that an emergency still exists in the national shortage for trained professional public health personnel. The action taken by Congress in title I of the Health Amendments Act of 1956 was a good first step and has shown that such action can reverse the trend of continuing depletion of trained persons working in public health.

The immediate situation urgently demands a continuing and expanded program of public health training. Because of population increases and ever-changing health problems, such expansion is imperative if the fruits of research are to be brought to all the people. The ever-increasing tempo of change has made forever obsolete the common concept that a person once qualified for his job seldom needs additional training.

Throughout the recommendations of the conference, these objectives are dominant:

1. To build the public health profession on a sound career basis and maintain standards by current scrutiny and long-range planning.

2. To enable the Federal Government to do those things which cannot be done so well by the States separately or which can be done adequately by only a few of them.

3. To treat the relationship between the Public Health Service and the States and universities as primarily a professional relationship, a collaboration for public service in a highly technical field rather than a matter of governmental power and jurisdiction.

4. To treat the schools of public health and other university institutions as partners with operating agencies in a professional enterprise, and to so administer exchanges of personnel and other relationships as to stimulate and maintain standards of the highest quality.

5. To stimulate initiative and high standards in Federal, State, and local health departments and in university professional education.

6. To so guide the development and staffing of the Nation's health programs that public service in this field will continue to be an honorable career enjoying public confidence with full incentives to each individual to improve his own professional abilities to serve the public.

The conferees made their basic recommendations for training in these areas: methods of administration, new areas for attention, the role of State governments, educational institutions, training methods in the Public Health Service, and evaluation and planning. The recommendations are grouped accordingly.

Methods of administration

It is recommended that—

1. The training program initiated under title I be a continuing program with a periodic evaluation every 5 years.

In recommending that there be a continuing Federal training program for public health workers, the conference is impressed and concerned by three situations revealed by the Source Book data, which it regarded as having serious implications for the Nation's health services: The large number (more than 20,000) of persons currently employed by official and voluntary health agencies who have not had adequate public health training; the number of key positions in State and local health departments currently vacant (well over 2,500) because trained professional personnel are not available to fill them; and the number of additional trained personnel (6,100) estimated as needed to meet the new demands for service during the next 5 years.

At the same time, the conference recognizes that it is impossible to predict precisely on a long-range basis either personnel needs or the cumulative impact of the training program recommended. Therefore, a periodic evaluation every 5 years would provide an opportunity for considering any changes which were indicated in either the magnitude or direction of the program.

2. The present dual method of awarding stipends directly to individuals by the Public Health Service and through grants to the training institutions be continued and that earmarked grants-in-aid to States be added to this training program. (See recommendation 14.)

The conference recognizes that to increase the effort to maintain and improve the competence of public health workers, it is necessary to use all feasible means of providing support for training. The above principal methods of Federal participation will assist in attaining this objective. Such a balanced approach gives the flexibility necessary to meet the changing and varying needs from State to State.

3. The amount of funds for the traineeship program be increased over the present level and the proportion of funds to be utilized in grants to individuals directly, and through training institutions, be determined by the Surgeon General with the assistance of an advisory committee.

The number of applications received for traineeships in the second year of the existing program was double the number of awards that the funds permitted. The need continues to be great. Applications can be expected immediately in numbers which will permit increasing the awards by 50 percent, to a total expenditure of $3 million per year for traineeship awards. Therefore, for the extended and expanded program of the type presently provided under title I a first year appropriation of $3 million is proposed for traineeship awards by the Public Health Service and by the schools of public health and the schools of nursing. The level of appropriations in future years should be determined on the basis of continuing needs for trained personnel, availability of qualified candidates, and the capacity of training institutions to accept candidates for training.

4. The Public Health Service continue to award its title I traineeship grants for the preparation of staff-level public health nurses through grants to institutions.

5. There be an increase in the number of traineeships available for awards by the schools of public health.

There is considerable sentiment among the conferees for increasing the number of traineeships available for awards by the schools of public health, in order to maximize the recruitment opportunities of the schools.

6. In the direct awards by the Public Health Service and institutions, continued high priority be given to students with little or no public health experience, with the recruitment and training of able young physicians given top priority. To be eligible for such traineeships individuals must have completed their basic professional training.

7. More flexibility than has been provided for in the administration of title I be used with respect to the length of training, so that individuals who are being prepared to fill key leadership, highly specialized, teaching, or other appropriate positions may be given traineeships for periods of more than 1 year.

8. In some instances direct grants be made to qualified individuals who have been working in Public Health for an extended period of time.

The conference endorses the Public Health Service policy of giving high priority to students with little or no public health experience in the title I program, and recommends continuation of this policy, with top priority given to the recruitment and training of able young physicians. However, the need for more flexibility—with respect both to length of training and length of public health experience—is emphasized. This is essential for the adequate preparation of selected individuals to fill key leadership or highly specialized positions in public health agencies or to engage in public health teaching. For example, 44 State health departments report that more than 2,000 of their personnel who have had 1 year of public health training now need additional academic training. Three-fourths of the total number are nurses.

9. An appropriation for administration of the program be included in new legislation for training.

Expansion of the Federal program for training public health workers along the lines recommended would inevitably increase the workload of the Public Health Service to the point that additional staff would be required for administration of the proposed new legislation.

In order to assure effective operation of the program which the conference envisioned, an appropriation for administration of the program should be included in new legislation for training.

New areas for attention

Although the basic patterns of administration have proved satisfactory, the conference explored new areas which were designed to strengthen the effectiveness of health programs. It was recognized that public health is not a matter exclusively in the domain of Government departments but is a matter in which many public and voluntary agencies, educational institutions, and independent professional groups must work together. The conference, therefore, considered the roles of teaching institutions and voluntary health agencies, and the need for better recruitment techniques and better personnel management methods in order to obtain the ablest recruits and to assure the continuation of high professional standards throughout the career of workers in the health field. Out of these considerations grew the following four recommendations, all of which propose a broadening of the scope of the present title I program.

It is recommended that—

10. Training be provided to meet not only the needs of the official public health agencies, but also the needs of (a) teaching institutions; (b) other agencies which conduct community health programs.

The conference feels that the needs of teaching institutions for qualified faculty had been clearly spelled out. As of December 31, 1957, all schools reporting felt that they lacked a total of 175 needed full-time teaching positions. By 1962, the schools estimate this figure would exceed 200. Since training of personnel for official and other agencies which conduct community health programs is dependent upon the availability of qualified instructors in the teaching institutions, the conference agrees that provision of training to meet the needs of educational institutions is extremely important, and recommends that training for this purpose be especially included in the extended title I program.

11. The administrative funds (see recommendation 9) provide for financing programs for the recruitment of trainees and that these programs be well integrated with recruitment efforts of the National Health Council, National League for Nursing, and other agencies.

12. Subject to appropriations there be a forward commitment to academic institutions of a certain number of traineeship awards for several years ahead, to permit necessary planning for faculty and facilities.

13. Funds be available for grants to academic institutions to support the basic activities of developing and administering continuation education programs in public health in full partnership with the operating health agencies of the several States and Territories and the appropriate professional associations.

In describing their training needs, State health departments were nearly unanimous in seeing a need for further development of continuation education programs for the professional personnel of State and local health departments. The conferees agree that more short on-campus and extension courses are needed, both refresher type courses and courses dealing with new public health program areas and with administration and management. To develop and administer such programs, the conference recommends that funds be made available to academic institutions.

Role of State governments

The conference carefully considered the relationship between Federal and State governments in the field of public health training and the functions each should assume.

Broadly outlined it was concluded that the Federal Government should continue to be responsible for the traineeship program (both through direct awards and through training institutions), for training of its own personnel, for financial assistance to public health training institutions, and for public health training grants-in-aid to States.

Assisted by the proposed matching grants-in-aid, States should assume responsibility for residency and field training, for in-service training of State and local personnel, for refresher and short-term training, and for special types of traineeship support that must be tailor made to meet the problems of the various States.

To this end, it is recommended that—

14. There be established an earmarked grants-in-aid program to the States for public health training and for recruitment of professional personnel.

The conference is convinced by the evidence presented that—in addition to (a) a Federal traineeship program of awards to individuals directly or through training institutions and (b) Federal support of educational institutions—there is need for Federal grants-in-aid to the States to assist them in meeting their public health training responsibilities and requirements.

It envisions that these funds will be used to support various types of public health training, provide support for preservice as well as in-service training, continuation training, field training, residency training, and other forms of public health training. These training programs, on the one hand, furnish an incentive for recruitment and, on the other hand, constantly improve the quality of public health service. Among the several forms of Federal assistance to public health training, recommended by the conference, grants-in-aid to the States earmarked for training purposes should have a high priority.

15. Three million dollars of Federal funds per year be appropriated for such grants-in-aid to States.

According to data submitted by official State and local health agencies, a total of more than 7,000 presently employed professional personnel would receive training during the next five years if adequate training funds and facilities were available. This represents a potential average increase of more than 80 percent over the number trained in 1957. In view of this potential and related information submitted by official health agencies, the conference believes that State health agencies are prepared to use immediately at least $3 million of Federal grants-in-aid. The conference firmly believes, too, that this should be a specifically earmarked grant so that it could not be diverted to other program exigencies of the health departments.

16. Each State be required to match $2 of Federal funds with a minimum of $1 of State and local funds.

Major Federal participation is recommended because: (a) This program will provide nationwide coverage; (b) personnel trained at the expense of one State will frequently pursue their public health careers in other States; (c) field training which is provided in one State may be for the benefit of trainees and educational institutions of other States.

Educational institutions

No professional field can flourish without strong professional schools of high standards and advanced standing. It is the influence of the teacher and of the critical questing scholar that makes a profession great.

Schools of public health have a special problem. Public health is an interdisciplinary field—a group of professions which supplement and complement one another—and a central task of the schools of public health is to provide the common background which relates the several professions effectively to one another in their common objectives.

Because there are only 11 schools of public health, they have a special difficulty. Their advanced scientific responsibility makes them costly and there is an understandable reluctance on the part of the individual States to support them much beyond the estimated level of the home State needs. These schools, either public or private, by their nature must be regional, national, and even international. As such they should have both Federal funds and coordinated relationships with the Federal health programs and with the programs of the several States, as well as with voluntary and professional organizations in the health field. Several of the conference recommendations relate to the future role and proper development of these schools.

The details need working out, but the conference urges the Congress to consider the schools, not as added applicants for educational funds, but in the light of their function in the seamless fabric of health protection for the Nation.

It is recognized that schools of public health are not alone in training for the public health professions. The largest number of employees in any single field in public health are the public health nurses who constitute a specialty of nursing that goes far beyond the bedside care expected of the registered nurse and must deal with the difficult problems of disease prevention and the promotion of family health. They are the field troops of the public health army. Engineers, sanitarians, nutritionists, and laboratory workers and many other specialists are also essential to complete the team. The numbers of these are too few in the total of American scientific education. Therefore the need for them and for their training should not be lost sight of.

It is recommended that—

17 Basic support for the operation of schools of public health be provided on a continuing basis. This support should be in sufficient amount to insure meeting the current and expanding needs of the existing accredited schools and for the needs of such additional accredited schools as may be established. Such support should be by direct grants to schools according to a formula developed by the Surgeon General in consultation with the schools.

Congress has already recognized the critical necessity of aid to schools of public health through the enactment of the Rhodes Act (Public Law 85–544, 85th Cong.) which authorizes $1 million for each of the next 2 years. This amount constitutes only about one-third of the difference between the cost to the schools of training Government sponsored trainees and the tuition paid by the Government for such trainees. Present estimates of the additional costs of expanding enrollment by 60 percent—the immediate goal proposed—are between $2,500,000 and $3 million annually. Further provision would be required for other expansion or for new schools. It was clearly the intent of Congress that this conference recommend any modifications in the Rhodes Act which it deemed necessary. The objectives of the above recommendation can best be accomplished by the following amendments to this act: (a) Remove the time limitation; (b) remove the appropriation ceiling; (c) remove the provision that primary consideration be given to certain categories of students.

It is important that legislation related to continuing support of the training programs in schools of public health be dealt with separately from other matters.

The conference feels that Congress should be able to deal with problems of the schools of public health on their own merits and thus avoid possible future conflicts between the needs of the schools of public health and those of the States. This potential conflict now exists under the Rhodes Act with respect to the present authorized ceiling of $30 million in the Public Health Service Act, section 314(c).

18. The immediate needs for a $15 million appropriation representing 70 percent of construction costs for additional teaching facilities for schools of public health be recognized and be considered by the Congress. Such aid for construction should not be made an organic part of the legislation dealing with traineeships.

The schools of public health have the same problem in obtaining facilities as they have in obtaining funds to defray operating expenses—with two-thirds of their students coming from out of State. State legislative support for construction, therefore, demands matching funds. The recommended total increase in enrollment of the schools is dependent upon provisions of facilities.

19. Annual grants be made to schools of nursing accredited for the preparation of nurses for public health to support the needs of expanding teaching programs with a current goal of 60 percent increase in student enrollment.

It is estimated that in addition to an increase in funds of over one-fourth million dollars which the schools expect to provide from their own resources, an additional sum of three-fourths million dollars annually is needed to provide for the basic operational costs of an expanded program, especially increases in faculty. This sum should be increased annually to provide for further expansion in enrollment and for new schools as needed.

20. The need for funds for construction of teaching facilities for schools of nursing which prepare students for public health nursing be recognized and be considered by the Congress. The provision of such funds should be separate from legislation dealing with traineeships.

21. Teaching grants be made available to institutions other than schools of public health and schools of nursing to improve the graduate teaching programs for training of public health sanitarians, public health engineers, public health laboratory scientists, public health nutritionists, and others in the public health field.

Training methods in the Public Health Service

The conference is convinced that no Federal agency has enjoyed a sounder professional relationship with the States than the Public Health Service. This relationship has developed over a period of more than half a century and is characterized by close cooperation in training, consultation, and service. Research grants to universities and to medical centers have been made in a spirit of professional rapport and cooperation befitting the career tradition of the Public Health Service.

The following series of recommendations are made concerning the training methods of the Public Health Service and the relationship of these activities to educational institutions and the States. In making these recommendations, the conferees were guided by suggestions received from official State and local health departments. These recommendations if carried out might be the first step toward making public health in a very genuine sense the first great field of public service which has a single nationwide community of professional skills. Devoted to the single objective of better health, it has the opportunity to rise above the ordinary frictions of economic, sectional, or political character which sometimes complicate other fields of public administration.

It is recommended that—

22. The Public Health Service, in lieu of establishing additional centers solely for training, make available direct training opportunities for staff of other agencies wherever and whenever it has a clinical, laboratory, or program operation suitable for a training program.

23. The Public Health Service expand its program assistance to States by making available teams of training specialists in places where needed training programs cannot be developed on a local or area basis because of the small size of agency staff, complexity of problem, or lack of facilities.

24. The Public Health Service seeks authority and funds to make available personnel on loan to operating agencies and educational institutions to assist these agencies in maintaining services while their own personnel are in training and when no other solution is possible. It is appreciated the Public Health Service will need to seek additional funds in order to accomplish this objective.

25. In order to promote professional growth and development steps be taken to encourage freer exchange of personnel between the Public Health Service, educational institutions, and State and local health agencies.

26. The Public Health Service continue to assume the appropriate initiative in the development of training programs to meet the needs of urgent and emergent public health problems.

27. The Public Health Service utilize all available professional and academic sources as well as in-service procedures for the training of its own personnel and that it seek additional funds to provide such training, including career development, for its personnel.

28. Direct training opportunities of the Bureau of Medical Services be strengthened and expanded.

Evaluation and planning

Several recommendations are made concerning both the current and long-range evaluation of the expanded training program which has been proposed. Some of these are designed to insure the efficiency of each part of the program in its daily administration. Some are designed to assure the effectiveness of teaching methods in the training program.

It is recommended that—

29. There be held an evaluation conference at the close of each 5 years of the expanded program for the training of professional public health workers, and that adequate administrative funds be appropriated for this purpose.

30. Appropriation be sought to make available a limited number of project teaching grants to institutions providing basic professional training. The purpose of such grants should be to support research and experimentation in the development of improved methods of teaching public health in these institutions.

31. Certain portions of the training funds be allocated for awarding traineeships, on a pilot study basis, for the last year of undergraduate academic training of public health sanitarians in schools which offer a recognized public health course that will qualify such personnel for first-level sanitarian positions in health departments.

IV. TRAINING FOR THE FUTURE

The call of the conference was to appraise the effectiveness of the title I training program in meeting the needs for public health personnel; to consider modifications needed in the basic legislation; and to consider the most effective distribution of responsibilities between Federal and State governments with respect to the administration and support of public health training. The basic recommendations have necessarily been directed to the needs of existing programs, i.e., to the staffing of public health departments as we know them in the 1950's.

But we must remember that it is only 15 years since the antibiotics revolutionized the control of communicable diseases. It is less than 15 years since the word "fallout" was added to the language. Nuclear fission and fusion have opened a barely discovered world of the atom as a source of sudden death, of boundless energy for industrial production, and as an instrument of medical science. Radioactive materials are a promise and a problem in public health protection. Tomorrow, by means not now suspected, ways may be found to wipe out cancer. Poliomyelitis is, hopefully, near its end. Mental illness may yield in some measure to new preventive methods not yet known or suspected.

These illustrations suggest that we should not be engaged merely in training some workers needed for familiar jobs in some governmental departments of health. Rather, we should be concerned with the further development of a complex interdisciplinary profession competent to deal with the changing life of the dynamic American community.

We can today, in July 1958, tell the Congress of the needs of the moment. No one can tell the Congress or the American people of the needs of 1980 or by name or number state the precise skills which will be necessary to meet the needs.

So it is that the conference comes to what is perhaps its most important conclusion: The greatest need of all is for the constant and continual estimate of emerging public health problems and the changes in staffing and organization essential to meet them. Only in this way can we insure the training and retraining of our professional personnel to conduct the fight against disease and death. Money alone cannot correct existing public health training deficiencies. Training activities of the Public Health Service, academic institutions, and State and local health departments should be amended and developed through continuous study of present-day and changing public health programs. Such a study on a broad basis should be pursued as an essential concomitant of the continuing national public health program.

On the military side of public policy these functions—intelligence, planning, and intensive training—are well and dramatically developed and generously financed. The great crises of the future may not come from a foreign enemy. Some unsuspected hazard of our complex industrial civilization may strike at home where DEW lines or bases at Thule or planes or bombs will be of no avail. "D" day for disease and death is every day. The battleline is already in our own community. To hold that battleline we must daily depend on specially trained physicians, nurses, biochemists, public health engineers, and other specialists properly organized for the normal protection of the homes, the schools, and the workplaces of some unidentified city somewhere in America. That city has, today, neither the personnel nor the resources of knowledge necessary to protect it.

THE COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PUBLIC HEALTH TRAINING

Preconference activities

The Surgeon General's National Advisory Committee on Public Health Training outlined the general approach to be followed by the conference and recommended the appointment of a steering committee and two preconference study committees. The steering committee, composed of the members of the National Advisory Committee, the chairman of each of the study committees, and representatives of the Public Health Service, was responsible for planning and organizing the conference. The preconference study committees, one on public health training needs and one on public health training resources, guided the collection of data and the preparation of material for consideration by the conference.

The personnel of the preconference committees were:

Steering committee: James K. Shafer, M.D., chairman; Franklin B. Amos, M.D.; Philip E. Blackerby, Jr., D.D.S.; Robert M. Brown, M.P.H.; Rolf Eliassen, Sc. D.; Roberta E. Foote, R.N.; Ruth Freeman, R.N., Ed. D.; Hugh Hussey, M.D.; Sol S. Lifson, M.P.H.; Malcolm H. Merrill, M.D.; Marion I. Murphy, R.N., M.P.H.; W. L. Treuting, M.D.; Charles E. Smith, M.D.; Berwyn F. Mattison, M.D.; and Elmer L. Hill, M.D.

Committee on needs for public health training: Berwyn F. Mattison, M.D., chairman; Philip E. Blackerby, Jr., D.D.S.; Marion Sheahan, R.N.; J. Robert Cameron, B.S.C.E., M.P.H.; and Franklyn B. Amos, M.D.

Committee on resources for public health training: Charles E. Smith, M.D., chairman; Wilson T. Sowder, M.D.; Marjorie Bartholf, R.N., M.S.; Harold S. Adams, B.S., and Sol S. Lifson, M.P.H.

Conference leadership

The individuals who presided over the conference and served in other official capacities were: Conference chairman, Berwyn F. Mattison, M.D.; conference secretary, Malcolm H. Merrill, M.D.; discussion group leaders, Franklin B. Amos, M.D., Sol S. Lifson, M.P.H.; Charles E. Smith, M.D.; W. L. Treuting, M.D.

Conference participants

Invitations to attend the conference were issued by the Surgeon General. The participants were chosen after careful review of persons broadly representative of various public health fields, professional associations, official and voluntary public health agencies, training institutions and geographic areas. Individuals were invited because of their potential for personal contribution and not as official representatives of their respective professions or employing agencies. Since the amount of funds available limited the number of participants to a relatively small group, care was taken to include a high proportion of individuals who could consider the problems related to public health training from multiple viewpoints.

The 63 persons whose names are listed below attended the conference:

Mr. Harold S. Adams, director, sanitary science courses, department of public health, Indiana University School of Medicine.

Dr. Franklyn B. Amos, director, office of professional training, New York State Department of Health.

Dr. Gaylord W. Anderson, Mayo professor and director, School of Public Health, University of Minnesota.

Miss Marjorie Bartholf, dean, School of Nursing, University of Texas, medical branch.

Dr. Leona Baumgartner, commissioner of health, the city of New York.

Dr. Stanhope Bayne-Jones, Chairman, Secretary's Consultants on Medical Research and Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. Arthur N. Beck, chief engineer and director, bureau of sanitation, Alabama State Department of Public Health.

Dr. Daniel Bergsma, State commissioner of health, New Jersey State Department of Health.

Dr. Frank G. Boudreau, president, Milbank Memorial Fund.

Miss Sara Brooks, director, public health nursing, Arlington (Va.) County Health Department.

Mr. Ray E. Brown, superintendent, University of Chicago Clinics.

Mr. J. Robert Cameron, director, division of environmental sanitation, department of health and hospitals, city and county of Denver.

Dr. James A. Crabtree, dean-elect, Graduate School of Public Health, University of Pittsburgh.

Miss Gertrude E. Cromwell, supervisor of nursing, Denver Public Schools.

Mr. E. B. Davis, secretary-treasurer, Georgia Department of Public Health.

Dr. James P. Dixon, commissioner, city of Philadelphia, department of public health.

Mrs. Margaret B. Dolan, associate professor of public health nursing, School of Public Health, the University of North Carolina.

Dr. Herbert R. Domke, commissioner of health, St. Louis County Health Department.

Dr. Rolf Eliassen, professor of sanitary engineering, department of civil and sanitary engineering, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Mr. Curtiss M. Everts, Jr., director, division of sanitation and engineering, Oregon State Board of Health.

Dr. Jack R. Ewalt, commissioner, Massachusetts State Department of Mental Health.

Dr. John P. Fox, director, division of graduate public health, School of Medicine, Tulane University.

Miss Ruth B. Freeman, associate professor, public health administration, School of Hygiene and Public Health, the Johns Hopkins University.

Dr. O. David Garvin, district health officer, the district health department, Orange-Person-Chatham-Lee Counties, N.C.

Dr. Vlado A. Getting, professor of public health practice, School of Public Health, University of Michigan.

Dr. Harold B. Gotaas, dean, the Technological Institute, Northwestern University.

Dr. Edward Grzegorzewski, head of the department of preventive medicine and public health, School of Medicine, University of Puerto Rico.

Dr. Albert V. Hardy, assistant State health officer, Florida State Board of Health.

Mrs. Ann Wilson Haynes, chief, bureau of health education, California State Department of Public Health.

Dr. Stanley L. Hendricks, public health veterinarian, division of preventable diseases, Iowa State Department of Health.

Dr. Herman E. Hilleboe, commissioner of health, New York State Department of Health.

Dr. Ira V. Hiscock, chairman, department of public health, Yale University.

Dr. Robert A. Kehoe, the Kettering Laboratory, College of Medicine, University of Cincinnati.

Dr. Herbert R. Kobes, director, division of services for crippled children, University of Illinois.

Dr. Hugh R. Leavell, professor of public health practice, department of public health practice, School of Public Health, Harvard University.

Miss Edna Lewis, director, public health nursing, George Peabody College for Teachers.

Mr. S. S. Lifson, director, health education, National Tuberculosis Association.

Mrs. Dorothy C. Lowman, chief, bureau of nursing, Utah State Department of Health.

Mr. Karl M. Mason, director, bureau of environmental health, Pennsylvania Department of Health.

Dr. Berwyn F. Mattison, executive secretary, the American Public Health Association.

Dr. E. G. McGavran, dean, School of Public Health, the University of North Carolina.

REPORT TO THE SURGEON GENERAL—PROFESSIONAL NURSE TRAINEESHIP PROGRAM—EVALUATION CONFERENCE (TITLE II, PUBLIC LAW 911) WASHINGTON, D.C., AUGUST 1958

(U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Public Health Service, Division of Nursing Resources)

What has been the impact of Federal aid to graduate nurses who want or need advanced preparation in administration, supervision, and teaching?

This conference met to consider that question, and to evaluate the first 2 years of awards as provided for by section 307 of the Public Health Service Act, title II of Public Law 911.

It was the intent of that legislation to strike a meaningful and conclusive blow at the Nation's continuing nurse shortage—a shortage of services, if not of numbers, a baffling inadequacy in skills and leadership which has been difficult to define and which has defied solution.

Since the professional nurse traineeship program was authorized July 1, 1956, through June 30, 1958, the Congress has appropriated $5 million for awards to approximately 1,800 graduate nurses. The vast majority of these trainees are women employed as nursing service directors or supervisors, faculty members in schools of nursing, or staff nurses desiring to qualify for more vital roles in their chosen profession. The majority were enrolled in master's degree programs; a few were completing baccalaureate degrees. All were desirous of improving their professional skills, of equipping themselves to make a greater contribution to patient care. Many had been struggling for years to obtain a higher education on a part-time or piece-meal basis, fighting against discouragement, financial strain, and fatigue. Many had been unable to enroll at all until the availability of Federal funds offered the individual incentive and won the support of nurse employers.

Although it is impossible to remedy long-standing weaknesses in a short-time span, the conference finds that without question, the traineeship program is successfully carrying out the intent of the Congress.

The first year of this program can be considered little more than a warming up period. Funds were not appropriated until almost the eve of the fall enrollment deadlines. Administrative machinery had to be put into action for the first time. The participating universities and colleges had to recruit candidates as well as to set up accounting systems. Thus, there were delays, oversights, and misunderstandings. Most of these predictable problems, however, were well under control during the second year.

Many difficulties remain. However, reports to this conference—from trainees, from schools, from the employers of nurses—are unanimously in favor of the continuation of the professional nurse traineeship program.

There are no strong objections to the structure of the present law, nor to the present method of administering the funds. There is feeling, however, that appropriations should be made to the Public Health Service early enough to permit earlier awards to the participating schools, that the schools should undertake more extensive publicity programs, and that additional grants should be made to the schools to help them meet the increased costs due to traineeship enrollments.

These matters, and similar modifications which may enable the program to operate more effectively and with greater speed, may be made at the discretion of the Surgeon General and with the counsel of his expert advisory committee. The evaluation conference, however, recommends that the program be extended, as it is now structured, without any drastic change.

To arrive at this and its more detailed conclusions, the conference had for reference an extensive source book of narrative and statistical data prepared by the Division of Nursing Resources. Some of this information will be cited in support of the findings of the conference, as contained in the report of the conference which follows.

The conferees desire to express appreciation to the Congress for the statute which made this program possible. They also desire to commend the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service for his leadership in carrying the program forward, and the staffs of the Bureau of Medical Services and of the Division of Nursing Resources for their role in administering the traineeship awards and especially in planning for and helping to manage this conference.

JOHN D. MILLETT,
Chairman, President, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

DECEMBER 1958.

PART I

* * * * *

The evaluation conference, professional nurse traineeship program, meeting in Washington, D.C., on August 13, 14, 15, 1958, recommends to the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service:

1. That this program be extended for a minimum of 5 years, with further evaluation at the end of the fourth year.

2. That no change be made in procedure at the present time to place the allocation of funds on a Federal-State matching basis, and that the extension of the program be continued under the Federal Government.

3. That consideration be given to developing a method by which appropriations for the program may be made available for more than a single year, to offer the participating schools more time in which to select and appoint candidates.

4. That the present method of administering the program be continued with future consideration to be given to the possibility of gradual "phasing out" of the prebaccalaureate programs of specialization in administration, supervision, and teaching.

5. That the selection of participating institutions be left to the discretion of the Expert Advisory Committee.

6. That the feasibility of providing training grants to the educational institutions be explored, in addition to the traineeship awards, if such modification would not jeopardize the continuation of the program.

7. That additional legislation be obtained (or new administrative interpretation be given to the present law) to provide traineeships for registered nurses in programs of general nursing leading to a baccalaureate degree.

8. That, under the existing statute, if funds are available, traineeship grants be provided for short-term institutes in administration and supervision for personnel now employed in these specialties.

This conference also recommends:

9. That participating schools give special consideration to requests for traineeships from qualified students who apply from States where there are no graduate programs in nursing.

10. That participating schools be encouraged to develop some programs specifically designed to prepare directors of hospital in-service educational programs for nurses.

11. That trainees enrolled in teaching programs be encouraged to accept in-service teaching positions in hospitals.

12. That a mechanism be provided for organization of regional or State (expert) advisory committees or conferences through which local employers of nurses and traineeship participants (both schools and graduate students) might discuss objectives and needs.

Accomplishments

The chief question before any group required to evaluate a program is: Has it accomplished anything and, if so, what?

This conference has recommended continuation of the professional nurse traineeship program, which may be construed as tacit recognition of accomplishment. However, it is not easy to pin down accomplishments resulting from traineeships.

Graduates who received traineeships in the latter part of calendar year 1957 had barely been able to return to employment by the time this meeting was held. The effect of their superior skills in hospital nursing service (or, indeed, whether or not they have acquired superiority) cannot yet be measured.

Similarly, if trainees are going to improve the quality of instruction in basic schools of nursing, it is too soon to notice any change—at least in terms of the result most hoped for, if not expected: A tidal wave of new nursing students clamoring to enter the profession of nursing.

The impact of the preparation of graduate students enrolled in the second year is even more difficult to estimate at this early date.

But this is not to imply that these events will not occur to some extent, or even dramatically, in the future. In recommending continuation of the program, with reevaluation after another 4 years, the conference was delineating a time span in which it believes measurable results may be obtained.

If the Congress should so extend the program, the conference strongly recommends that the Public Health Service immediately begin to set up machinery for gathering specific information about trainees—their pretraineeship employment and skills, the direction of their study and the purpose behind selection of one area of specialization as against another, and the type of employment sought and obtained after completing the specialty training.

Meanwhile, there are significant and observable changes taking place in nursing service which as yet may not be statistically reportable but which nevertheless merit attention:

The traineeship program has already stopped the trend of decreasing enrollments in graduate programs.

It has increased the number of full-time enrollments and has begun to slough off excessive and costly part-time enrollments. This is especially significant at the master's level where the longest delays have been encountered in completing graduate work. (Often a nurse might struggle along for years, earning only a few credits a year toward the 60 to 90 required for the degree.)

The program has stimulated hospital administrators and other employers of nurses to reexamine the educational preparation of their own personnel in terms of adequacy of performance.

The availability of funds for study in administration, supervision, and teaching has encouraged increasing numbers of employers to grant educational leave. Formerly, many nurses desiring specialty preparation did not seek it because they knew their employers would not hold their jobs for them until the degree was obtained.

* * * * *

Because the program is a topic of frequent conversation in hospitals, the administrators, doctors, and nurses themselves are giving more thought to the ways in which services to patients can be improved and increased by means of better prepared personnel. In some hospitals this improvement may mean installing a nursing service director with up-to-the-minute management skills. Or enabling head nurses and other supervisors to acquire new knowledge in the field of interpersonal relationships and other techniques of supervision. Administrative nurses with additional study in nursing service management know how to assign personnel for the optimum benefit to patients and individual satisfaction as well. They see ways of avoiding waste of skills by misassignment and ways of providing opportunity for personal growth through the challenge of the work assignment and the opportunities it offers for the development of creative faculties in the nursing care of patients.

The professional nurse traineeship program has started a chain of thinking throughout the Nation which unquestionably will work toward the advantage of patients. That nurses themselves will benefit, even when not the recipient of a traineeship award, is illustrated by the fact that, already in States where money and facilities are scarce, higher education for nurses has become a major program item in professional association planning and a subject enthusiastically discussed wherever nurses meet to talk off duty.

Most important of all, the traineeship program has put hope in the hearts of many who sought self-improvement and career development. Basically, nurses want to nurse. They also want to be expertly prepared for whatever aspect of patient care they may be called on to perform. They recognize that good leadership makes or breaks a nursing service program. They know that directing care with scientific accuracy, with the warmth of human understanding, and with imagination and ingenuity takes education as well as innate ability. They know that every member of the nursing service, from the least skilled aid or orderly on up through the professional nursing staff, reflects the determination, the attitude, the efficiency, and the humanity of top management.

In the field of teaching, nurses know that the student who graduates from the Nation's hospital or collegiate schools of nursing has learned everything she knows about nursing from the faculty of her school and from the staff or head nurses in the hospital units where she has had her clinical experience. It is an enormous responsibility to instruct a young woman who in turn will have the grave responsibility of caring for the sick, understanding their needs, teaching them the principles of good health and hygiene. It is an injustice without equal to expect R.N.'s—graduate professional nurses—to assume this teaching role without offering them at least the security of an adequate education. This is what the professional nurse traineeship program is trying to do.

The conference believes that, given a sufficient amount of time, it will be possible to demonstrate more than satisfactory advances in all the areas mentioned.

* * * * *

Continuation of program

This conference has recommended that the professional nurse traineeship program continue, essentially as it is now operating and as authorized by the present law, for a minimum of 5 years, with reevaluation at the end of the fourth year.

There was no question in anyone's mind that could conceivably have led the conference to raise doubts about the value of Federal spending to assist graduate nurse education. Small as the imprint of traineeship funds may be, in only 2 years of operation, the removal of this aid would drastically curtail the movement of the nursing profession toward better preparation for patient care. Although many other methods of financing have been investigated, no single device has yet been found which would enable the Federal Government to detach itself completely from providing assistance, without an ultimate loss to the employers of nurses and to the patients whom they serve.

The feasibility of a program of Federal-State matching aid has been carefully studied. The conference does not eliminate State participation as a possible future development, but believes it is impractical at present for the following reasons:

1. The need is urgent. Because State enabling legislation will be necessary, delay or no action whatever may be the result.

2. The present plan provides traineeships for all States in the country. This advantage might be lost in a Federal-State matching system.

3. Each State would need to set up administrative machinery, thereby multiplying the cost many times the present amount.

4. The administration of the program by the Federal Government has been without pressure or political favoritism. This freedom might be lost in a Federal-State matching program.

5. An indiscriminate mushrooming of graduate nurse programs might result from overemphasis at the State level; the availability of State money might encourage some schools to develop programs chiefly to take advantage of the State grants.

6. A program of State matching might lead States to require those aided to become employed in the State and to remain there for a specified time. This control would make it impossible for States where there are no graduate-nurse programs to benefit by the national effort to improve the preparation of administrators, supervisors, and teachers.

In general, the conference believed that Federal-State matching could best serve to supplement the present program, rather than to replace it. States should therefore be encouraged to offer similar funds to their own schools, thereby enabling larger enrollments. Part-time study, in-service education, and institutions and workshops are areas in which State appropriations could well supplement the Federal assistance.

It is not possible for this conference to advise what State agency would be the most appropriate to administer a program of State assistance, a further deterrent in the search for ways of establishing Federal-State matching.

These conclusions were achieved after consideration of a wide variety of opinions submitted to the division of nursing resources by the States. The decision not to recommend Federal-State financing followed unanimous acceptance by the conferees of the report submitted to it by the committee on Federal-State relations. This report is reproduced in part II.

It is neither desirable nor practical to recommend that the Federal Government forever be the sole agent in support of graduate nursing education. Private philanthropies, citizen groups, and individuals properly should assume a portion of the load and should therefore be encouraged to provide scholarships. States should be similarly encouraged, as should also nursing and allied professional organizations.

In the opinion of the conference, it is proper for the Federal Government to assume the cost of assistance for about one-third of the number of nurses who need and desire preparation in the special fields of administration, supervision, and teaching. This means that if 6,000 nurses are to be graduated from programs in these specialties each year, the Federal share would be approximately 2,000. An annual amount no less than $6 million should be appropriated for each year of the program, if that goal is to be reached.

Is It Necessary to Continue the Program?

The conference finds that 9 out of 10 registered nurses do not have degrees. In the fields of administration, teaching, and supervision, four out of five do not have degrees.

There are at present more nurses without degrees than the total nurse supply in 1952. Only 34 percent of nursing service directors have degrees. Nurse educators and supervisors of public health nursing are the best educated (71 percent with degrees).

It is generally agreed by nursing and hospital groups that nurses in administration, supervision, and teaching should have completed at least a bachelor's degree. In 1956 there were about 93,000 nurses active in these specialties. Yet only 15,200 held baccalaureate degrees; 5,600 held master's.

These facts would be less shocking if there were some avenue other than formal education by which nurses responsible for directing and teaching others could obtain the most current knowledge on how to do it, at the same time keeping pace with rapid developments in science and research related to patient care.

Hospitals need better prepared nurses and say they want them. About 700 hospitals with and without schools of nursing, reported on this subject to the Division of Nursing Resources. Invariably, they expressed a strong conviction that patients could be better cared for if nurses were better educated. This applied across the board, from the position of assistant head nurse to the top job, director of nursing services. (They seemed to be generally content with the level of preparation of staff nurses without supervisory responsibilities.)

In this group of reporting hospitals, graduate education was more usual in hospitals with schools of nursing—and also more sought after by the administrators reporting.

For example, administration want 44 percent more master's degree directors of nursing in hospitals with nursing schools than are now employed. Hospitals without schools of nursing said that 43 percent more of their supervisors should have baccalaureate degrees; hospitals with schools of nursing said 57 percent more should be so prepared.

In hospitals with no school of nursing, 31 percent more directors of in-service education should have baccalaureate degrees, 13 percent more master's, their employers said; in hospitals with schools of nursing, 42 percent more in-service educators should have baccalaureate degrees and 24 percent more should have master's. Hospitals with schools of nursing also want 50 percent more assistant nursing service directors qualified at baccalaureate level and 21 percent more at master's.

Thus, the need for additional preparation may be seen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 731) to extend certain traineeship provisions of the Health Amendments Act of 1956, introduced by Mr. HILL, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

INTRODUCTION OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION BY SENATOR CAPEHART

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a series of bills. Attached to each is a statement I have prepared on it. I ask unanimous consent that the statements and the text of the bills be printed in the body of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills and statements will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART, were received, read twice by their titles, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Finance:

S. 732. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 and to encourage small-business concerns to engage in foreign trade.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 921 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (Public Law 591, Eighty-third Congress) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 921. Definition of Western Hemisphere trade corporations.

"For purposes of this subtitle, the term 'Western Hemisphere trade corporation' means a domestic corporation all of whose business (other than incidental purchases) is done in any country or countries in North, Central, or South America, or in the West Indies, and which satisfied the following conditions:

"(1) if 95 percent or more of the gross income of such domestic corporation for the one-year period immediately preceding the close of the taxable year (or for such part of such period during which the corporation was in existence) was derived from sources without the United States, the sources of gross income shall in general be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 862: Provided, however, That for the purposes of this section, where personal property is manufactured within the United States and sold, either by the manufacturer or by a wholly owned subsidiary of the manufacturer, for use or consumption in and actually shipped in due course to a Western Hemisphere country, the seller's income from such transactions shall be treated as derived entirely from sources other than sources within the United States; and

"(2) if 90 percent or more of its gross income for such period or such part thereof was derived from the active conduct of a trade or business.

For any taxable year beginning prior to January 1, 1954, the determination as to whether any corporation meets the requirements of section 109 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 shall be made as if this section had not been enacted and without inferences drawn from the fact that this section is not expressly made applicable with respect to taxable years beginning prior to January 1, 1954."

The statement accompanying Senate bill 732 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

We find in existent law a provision intended by the Congress to inspire trade between Western Hemisphere countries and the United States.

However, a Treasury interpretation of the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act has resulted in a discriminatory situation denying smaller manufacturers the same tax benefits available to larger manufacturers operating under the Act.

The bill I offer would require the consideration by the President of the United States the inclusion of Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act provisions in the negotiation of trade agreements with Western Hemisphere countries.

It would also clarify the original intent of Congress whereby the existing discrimination would be eliminated.

Under the original Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act, which was made a part of the Internal Revenue Code in 1942, all corporations meeting the requirements of the act would be subject to 38 percent tax.

At the time the Senate Finance Committee recommended passage of the act, the committee said in its report, and I quote:

"American companies trading in foreign countries within the Western Hemisphere are placed at a considerable competitive disadvantage with foreign corporations under the tax rates provided by the bill. To alleviate this competitive inequality, the committee bill relieves such corporations from surtax liability."

I call your attention to the fact that the Senate Finance Committee clearly indicated in its report that the benefits were intended to place all United States industry in a more desirable competitive position.

Treasury's interpretation provides that only those manufacturers whose Western Hemisphere trade corporation changes title outside continental United States shall benefit.

Nothing in the bill nor in the committee's report, indicates it was the congressional intent to create the inequality created by the Treasury interpretation.

That there is discrimination and inequality in the effect of the interpretation is admitted by Treasury.

I have in my possession a letter from a former Acting Secretary of the Treasury in which discrimination is admitted.

Also, in answering questions before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee on small-business matters a high official of the Treasury Department admitted for the record that an inequality exists.

Now, let me point out the discrimination existing in the operation of the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act under Treasury's interpretation.

The larger manufacturer has no problem in changing title to goods outside continental United States since he maintains agencies in most of the Western Hemisphere countries.

Smaller manufacturers, operating under the historical small-business method of changing title at domestic banks where buyers maintain lines of credit, cannot afford to maintain agencies in the many countries of the Western Hemisphere since the volume of export for them would not support that type operation.

As a result we find the smaller manufacturer is denied a favorable competitive position with low-labor-cost countries for Western Hemisphere business.

We also find, that Western Hemisphere buyers who desire United States goods are forced to purchase from other countries because of the price differential.

Many cases of lost contracts have been cited to me where a 14-point tax benefit to the United States producer would have permitted him to bid successfully for the business.

After considering the evidence submitted to the committee that committee said in its report, and I quote:

Foreign trade by smaller concerns is as important to this country as trade by bigger businesses. Such trade may even be more important to the continued existence and good health of small business. Legislation permitting equal application of the Western Hemisphere trade corporation provisions to small business should be passed immediately.

At this point, I want to say that the Small Business Administration, in its report to the committee on the proposed change in the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act, supported the provisions of the bill as a definite benefit to smaller manufacturing exporters and a means of eliminating the existing discrimination.

Also, the Export-Import Bank submitted a report supporting the proposed bill.

As we all know, the Export-Import Bank has much experience in the export problems of smaller manufacturers.

One further point of interest with regard to the support of this legislation is the fact that the House Ways and Means Committee in 1953 voted to make the change in the act.

Now, it is only fair that we discuss some of the points Treasury raises in opposition to the passage of an amendment to correct the act.

First, of course, would be the fear of loss of revenue.

I can best answer that by reading from a letter I received from a smaller manufacturer who has been hurt by the existing inequality and I quote:

"As a specific illustration let us assume that one or more small companies were able to do enough export business that they were able to show a profit of $100,000.

"At the present time the tax on this at 52 percent would amount to $52,000.

"At the 38 percent rate which the export corporation would be entitled to, the tax would be $38,000 and the Treasury might figure that they had lost $14,000 revenue.

"But if these small companies were able to take enough additional business away from the large corporation export subsidiaries (which pay no U.S. tax) to earn a profit of $38,000, then the small companies would pay a tax of 38 percent on $38,000 or $14,060, which is more than the Treasury thought they were losing."

Actually, from what I saw of our competition on my visits to Latin-American in recent years I am quite confident that we can lose no revenue by this change because small manufacturers are finding it less and less possible to compete in this market.

If we are not doing the business, we cannot lose revenue. It is more likely that we would increase revenue by increasing the business potential at 38 percent.

Another point raised by Treasury in support of its interpretation is established by the wording of the report of the conference committee on the original act in 1942.

That report stated that the surtax exemption would be provided to domestic corporations deriving their income principally—here I quote from the report—"from the active conduct of the trade or business in foreign countries within the Western Hemisphere."

In other words, Treasury has said over the past years that you can qualify under the Western Hemisphere Trade Corporation Act only if you are actively conducting business in a foreign Western Hemisphere country.

If that is the case, then we find the interpretation encouraging the incorporation of United States businesses in foreign countries and we would derive no revenue whatever from its operations.

Even under that argument, we have failed to find any case where sales were made in Western Hemisphere countries by smaller manufacturers where the seller's services through representatives or engineers were not involved in consummating the sale at the consuming point.

In closing, I should like to say that by giving the President the authority to include the originally intended provisions of the Western Hemisphere Act in trade agreements with Western Hemisphere countries we will be taking long-needed action on behalf of the smaller manufacturers and at the same time strengthening our trading position with those countries.

S. 733. A bill to prevent discrimination against fiscal year taxpayers with respect to depletion allowance.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 613 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to percentage depletion) is amended by adding the following:

"(d) CHANGE IN RATE.—In the case of a taxable year ending after December 31, 1953, which includes the effective date of a change in the rate of percentage depletion, the allowance for depletion for the taxable year shall be an amount equal to the sum of:

"(1) that portion of a tentative allowance computed without regard to such change in the rate of percentage depletion which the number of days in the taxable year before the effective date of the change bears to the total number of days in the entire taxable year; plus

"(2) that portion of a tentative allowance computed as if such change in the rate of percentage depletion were applicable for the entire taxable year, which the number of days in the taxable year on or after the effective date of such change bears to the total number of days in the entire taxable year.

The rules prescribed in this subsection shall also apply for the taxable year for which a rate of percentage depletion first applies. For the purposes of this subsection, effective date of change means 'effective date of change' as defined in section 21 (c)."

The statement accompanying Senate bill 733 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

The Internal Revenue Code of 1954, section 613, increased the percentage depletion rates on gross income for some minerals and allowed percentage depletion for the first time for some other minerals. These provisions became effective under the general rule for applicability of the 1954 code, i.e., only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1953, and ending after August 16, 1954. Thus, the new depletion rates are not applicable to fiscal years beginning in 1953 and ending in 1954 or to short taxable years beginning in 1954 and ending before August 17, 1954.

I have introduced, for appropriate reference, a bill which is designed to modify the 1954 code rule so as to apply the new depletion rates to the portion of a fiscal year which falls in the calendar year 1954. A prorationing of depletion allowances available under the 1939 code and under the 1954 code depletion rates would be provided through a formula which is based on the number of days in the taxable year falling before, and those falling on or after, January 1, 1954.

This means that the new rates apply to calendar year taxpayers for the entire year 1954, but that they apply to fiscal year taxpayers only for a part of 1954—between 1 and 11 months, depending on the fortuitous chance of when their fiscal years began. This discrimination is obviously inequitable. Furthermore, it places fiscal year taxpayers at a serious competitive disadvantage compared to calendar year taxpayers in the same business.

An example of the inequitable effect of the present effective date provision is a limestone producer with a fiscal year ending November 30. This taxpayer is entitled to the new 15 percent of gross income depletion rate for only 1 month of his 1954 production, whereas calendar year limestone producers are entitled to the 15-percent rate on their entire 1954 output.

Congress provided relief in an exactly parallel situation which arose under the Revenue Act of 1951. The 1951 act made increases in depletion rates effective only for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1950—thus creating the same inequity as the effective date of the 1954 changes. When the inequity was pointed out Congress corrected it in 1952 by making the changes effective for all taxpayers alike on January 1, 1951 (sec. 5, Public Law 594, 82d Cong., 2d sess., 66 Stat. 818, approved July 21, 1952).

Clearly the same relief is needed in the case of the 1954 code.

Approximately 50 percent of the limestone industry, especially the old line producers, use the end of their quarrying season, namely, November 30, as the end of their business year and the newer producers—approximately 50 percent of the industry—use the calendar year. Obviously, one-half of the industry enjoyed substantial competitive advantage over the fiscal year operators which anyone must agree was not the intent of Congress.

The limestone industry currently is suffering substantial economic recession and the refund of this unfair and inequitable tax will contribute toward stabilizing the current financial position of many of the smaller producers.

S. 734. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that no documentary stamp tax shall be imposed with respect to conveyances under which the real property of any person is transferred to a State or political subdivision thereof as a result of condemnation, or threat or imminence of such condemnation.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 4362 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to exemptions from the documentary stamp tax on conveyances) is amended by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c), and by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b) STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT CONVEYANCES.—The tax imposed by section 4361 shall not apply to any deed, instrument, or writing under which the real property of any person is transferred to a State or political subdivision thereof as a result of condemnation, or of a threat or imminence of such condemnation, by such State or political subdivision."

(b) Section 4383 of such Code (relating to liability for tax) is amended by striking out "The tax" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in section 4362(b), the tax".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall apply only with respect to deeds, instruments, and writings executed on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The statement accompanying Senate bill 734 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

I have introduced for appropriate reference, a bill which would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that no documentary stamp tax shall be imposed with respect to conveyances under which the real property of any person is transferred to a State or political subdivision thereof as a result of condemnation, or threat, or imminence of such condemnation.

The very nature of condemnation or threat of condemnation assumes or implies an unwilling seller. The imposition of a tax on a willing seller is inherent in the statute; but the use or threat of use of legal proceedings upon a presumably unwilling seller added to the liability to the imposition of a Federal tax upon that unwilling seller is something more than should, in equity and good conscience, be condoned.

The loss of tax revenue to the Federal Government, under this provision, would indeed be small; whereas the inequity which it purports to correct would indeed be great.

S. 735. A bill to remove the manufacturers excise tax on metal tennis nets.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 4161 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to manufacturers excise tax on sporting goods) is amended by striking out "Tennis balls, nets, rackets" and inserting in lieu thereof "Tennis balls, nets (other than metal nets), rackets".

(b) The amendment made by this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins not less than 10 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

The statement accompanying Senate bill 735 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

I have introduced, for appropriate reference a bill which can fairly be considered a technical amendment to the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to correct an inequitable and perhaps an unintended omission in the list of certain items not taxable thereunder.

There are some 19 sporting goods items exempt, regardless of use or ultimate consumer, from the manufacturer's excise tax provision of the code because they are deemed to be used primarily for school sports and by children. This bill would add to the exempt list "metal nets" as distinguished from "nets" as contained in the provision imposing a tax on "tennis balls, nets, rackets."

I am reliably informed and it is my understanding that more than 75 percent of such "metal nets" manufactured are sold for public school and municipal playground use and accordingly are eligible for tax exemption certificates. In such case the manufacturer is presently required to assess, collect, and remit the tax to the appropriate Director of Internal Revenue, obtain an exemption certificate from the purchaser, refund the amount of tax collected from the purchaser back to the purchaser, and adjust by means of a tax credit his [the manufacturer] own tax return. I am further informed that tax revenues inuring to the Government in this area are quite small.

This practice appears to me to be one of those burdensome, time consuming, complicated and expensive accounting procedures so common to the businessman, but yet so unjustified and unexplainable.

It is entirely possible and perhaps likely that the accounting and enforcement cost to the Government of this item exceeds the revenues derived therefrom. And accordingly I request the Senate in good conscience and as a matter of sound business and fiscal practice to consider this amendment to the Internal Revenue Code.

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

S. 736. A bill to amend the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 to increase public disclosure of security ownership.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (a) of section 16 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 is amended by striking out the figure "10" in such subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "5".

(b) Subsection (b) of section 16 of such Act is amended by striking out "such beneficial owner, director, or officer" where it first appears in such subsection and inserting in lieu thereof "the beneficial owner of more than 10 per centum of any class of any equity security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange, or by a director or officer of the issuer of such security".

(c) Subsection (c) of section 16 of such Act is amended by striking out "such beneficial owner, director, or officer" and inserting in lieu thereof "beneficial owner of more than 10 per centum of any class of any equity security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange, or any director or officer of the issuer of such security".

The statement accompanying Senate bill 736 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

I have introduced, for appropriate reference a bill which in substance requires that those persons seeking to control corporations by the purchase of stock and by the accumulation and acquisition of proxies be required to make full disclosure of their identity to the Securities Exchange Commission.

Primarily the bill purports to protect the stockholders, officers, directors, and prospective investors of corporations, as well as the general public, by requiring disclosure of contemplated changes in management in order to provide information and to assist in the detection, prevention, and punishment of fraud, manipulation, and other illegal activities in the securities markets, where Federal jurisdiction is involved.

This bill in effect would provide for an extension of the "full disclosure" principles of the Federal securities laws, which have been most effectively administered by the Securities Exchange Commission in recent years and by means of which a vast amount of business and financial information has become available to the investing public.

The importance of all such "full disclosure" measures will increase in proportion to our expanding and developing economy and the concomitant requirements for large amounts of new investment capital.

S. 737. A bill to amend section 31 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 31 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, as amended, is amended by designating the present provisions thereof as subsection (a) and by substituting in the second sentence thereof the words "one two-hundredths of 1 per centum" for the words "one five-hundredths of 1 per centum" and by adding the following two new paragraphs at the end thereof:

"(b) Every registered broker-dealer shall pay to the Commission on or before April 15 of each calendar year a registration fee for the privilege of doing business as a registered broker or dealer during the preceding calendar year or any part thereof. Such fee shall be in an amount equal to one two-hundredths of 1 per centum of the aggregate dollar amount of the price of securities (other than securities which are direct obligations of or obligations guaranteed as to principal or interest by the United States or such securities issued or guaranteed by corporations in which the United States has a direct or an indirect interest as shall be designated for exemption from the provisions of this section by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors; securities which are direct obligations of or obligations guaranteed as to principal or interest by a State or any political subdivision thereof or any agency or instrumentality of a State or any political subdivision thereof or any municipal corporate instrumentality of one or more States) sold as a broker or dealer otherwise than on a national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year and subsequent to the registration as a broker or dealer.

"(c) Every national securities exchange and every registered broker or dealer shall make such reports as the Commission by its rules and regulations may prescribe as necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this section."

SEC. 2. This Act shall apply to transactions occurring on and after the ninetieth day after the date of its enactment.

The statement accompanying Senate bill 737 is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

I have introduced for appropriate reference a bill which would amend section 31 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 which requires every national securities exchange to pay to the Securities and Exchange Commission on or before March 15 of each calendar year a registration fee for the privilege of doing business as a national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year or any part of that year. The fee is presently fixed at one five-hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of sales of covered securities transacted on such exchange during the preceding calendar year and subsequent to its registration as a national securities exchange. This corresponds to a fee of 2 cents per $1,000 on such transactions. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1956, this particular schedule of fees resulted in the payment of $785,214. Along with other fees collected by the Commission, these are all deposited in the general fund of the U.S. Treasury and are not available for expenditure by the Commission. However, they have the effect of reducing the net cost to the general Federal taxpayer of the operations of the Commission.

In practice, this fee is passed on to investors by brokers' charges to their customers in connection with transactions executed on the nationally recognized exchanges. The fee appears on the confirmations furnished by brokers to customers covering these transactions. This bill would increase the rate for these fees to one two-hundredth of 1 percent from one five-hundredth of 1 percent. This is equivalent to an increase from a rate of 2 cents per $1,000 to a rate of 5 cents per $1,000.

At the present time no similar fee is charged on transactions handled in the over-the-counter market. This bill would charge a fee at the same rate of one two-hundredths of 1 percent on the aggregate dollar amount of the price of covered securities sold as a broker or dealer otherwise than on a national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year and subsequent to the registration as a broker or dealer. This registration fee would be charged for the privilege of doing business as a registered broker or dealer during the preceding calendar year or any part thereof.

An express exemption from the fees charged registered broker-dealers is included in the bill for securities that are (1) direct obligations of the United States, (2) obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States, or (3) issued or guaranteed by corporations in which the United States has a direct or an indirect interest as designated for exemption by the Secretary of the Treasury. This is the same exemption provided in the case of fees charged national securities exchanges under section 31 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 in its present form.

The Senate Committee on Banking and Currency supports this legislation for the following reasons:

1. It places registered brokers and dealers handling transactions in the over-the-counter market on a par with national securities exchanges in sharing the incidence of fees of the nature provided by this bill.

2. It is desirable to realize a greater return to the U.S. Treasury for services performed by the Securities and Exchange Commission. This bill will make possible an increased return without placing any additional burden upon Federal taxpayers.

3. Whatever slight effect the bill may have upon the matter of inflation will constitute a restraining influence.

4. The added revenue derived by reason of the bill will provide a source of additional funds against which the Commission can make an equitable claim through the medium of requests for additional appropriations to carry out the functions assigned to the Commission by the Congress.

PREVENTION OF UNJUST DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF AGE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am today introducing proposed legislation to prevent and eliminate unjust discrimination in employment because of age in the three major areas where the Federal Government has some jurisdiction over employment practices. The first bill prevents such discrimination by firms engaged in interstate commerce, while the remaining two measures ban age bias in employment by employers fulfilling Federal contracts or subcontracts and by those firms located in the District of Columbia.

The first proposal, called the National Act Against Age Discrimination in Employment, declares that it shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to:

First. Refuse to hire, discharge, or otherwise discriminate against any person in respect to his employment because of age when the reasonable demands of the job do not require an age distinction; and Second. Utilize the services of any employment agency, placement service, labor organization, or other agency which discriminates on account of age.

It would also be unlawful for any labor union to maintain membership requirements or other procedures which would tend to rule out or limit employment opportunities, or adversely affect wages, hours, or working conditions because of an individual's age. The same prohibitions are contained in the other two bills, and in all the proposals there are enforcement provisions.

As our economy rallies from the recession lows of 1958, we must bear in mind the most significant fact that the problem of dealing with unjust discrimination against workers over 45 in employment is relatively more severe at a time when our economy is expanding than it is during a period of contraction.

An analysis of U.S. Census Bureau figures shows that during the peak unemployment month of April 1958, about 6 percent of the United States labor force in both the 25 to 44 and the 45 to 64 age group was out of work. Although the average duration of unemployment for older workers was 2 weeks longer, 15.4 weeks compared to 13.4 weeks for the younger workers, both groups had a similar proportion unemployed more than 15 weeks—40 percent over 44 and 37 percent between 25 and 44. However, during April 1957, when our economy was still in a period of expansion, workers between 45 and 64 had an average duration of unemployment extending 16.1 weeks, compared to 10.8 weeks for younger workers; 35 percent of our older workers were unemployed more than 15 weeks at that time, compared to only 23 percent between 25 and 44.

It is apparent that seniority offers a degree of protection to older workers during a recession period and that they are rehired by their former employers at a relatively faster rate as conditions return to normal. However, there is a very real danger that as employers start to expand their labor force and create brandnew job opportunities, they will discriminate heavily against older workers who apply for these new assignments, particularly if some additional training may be required. As a result, many of our 1.2 million workers past 44 presently unemployed may not share fully in the benefits of an expanding U.S. economy.

Although about 70 percent of the companies in one recent survey said they did not have a fixed policy against hiring workers above a certain age, the remaining 30 percent admitted that they did set an age ceiling of 44. In addition, a nationwide study of hiring practices by the Labor Department showed that in 70 percent of the cities surveyed, more than half of the jobs registered with employment offices listed a maximum hiring age.

At any period, age bias in employment is harmful to our national economic structure. It imposes an artificial limitation on the size of the manpower pool from which we can draw experienced, highly skilled employees, and it materially raises the number of persons requiring public assistance, while depriving our mature citizens of the dignity and status of self-support derived from constructive vocational activity.

In a 1958 survey of 163 manufacturing plants, older workers once again were revealed to have proven records of high productivity, excellent attendance, mature response to teamwork pressures, harmonious employee relations, and low accident rates. If their experienced talents and skills are not fully utilized, then U.S. industry may be handicapping its own productive capacity and retarding the overall rate of our economic growth.

Admittedly, age discrimination in employment cannot be legislated out of existence, but the bills I am introducing today can provide a suitable basis for solution to be brought about by law. Last year, when New York passed the McCahan-Preller Act to prohibit this type of discrimination, it was only the fourth State to do so—the other States administering such a law are Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania. There remains a great opportunity and necessity for the Federal Government to exercise the same kind of leadership in this field that it did following enactment of the Davis-Bacon Act, which set up Federal standards for wages, hours, and conditions of employment. My three proposals offer a starting point from which we can reach for the ultimate goal of barring age discrimination in employment wherever it exists and provide the Government leadership so necessary if we are to make progress.

Under the terms of my proposed National Act Against Age Discrimination in Employment dealing with firms engaged in interstate commerce, the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor may issue cease and desist orders against violators and authorize the reinstatement or hiring of employees with or without back pay. Further violations subject the employer to contempt of court proceedings. Under the D.C. Act Against Age Discrimination in Employment, similar enforcement machinery is at the disposal of the Chairman of the Minimum Wage and Industrial Safety Board in the District of Columbia in dealing with businesses located there. The three bills also provide for judicial review along with conciliation, technical assistance, and other aids to both employees and employers.

In the case of employers who practice age discrimination in the performance of work for the U.S. Government or the District of Columbia Government, and persist even after a notice and hearings, then Federal and D.C. contracts and subcontracts are subject to cancellation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 738. A bill to prohibit unjust discrimination in employment because of ages; and

S. 739. A bill to eliminate discriminatory employment practices on account of age by contractors and subcontractors in the performance of contracts with the United States and the District of Columbia.

To the Committee on the District of Columbia:

S. 740. A bill to prohibit, within the District of Columbia, unjust discrimination in employment because of age.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL COAL MINE SAFETY ACT

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGEE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act in order to remove exemption with respect to certain mines employing no more than 14 individuals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for additional cosponsors until Friday of this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill wil be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk until Friday of this week.

The bill (S. 743) to amend the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act in order to remove the exemption with respect to certain mines employing no more than 14 individuals, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this bill is the same as the bill I had the honor of sponsoring last year, which unfortunately failed of passage. The bill would repeal the provision in the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act which exempts from Federal inspection those mines in which 14 or fewer people work regularly underground.

Government statistics show that the rate of fatalities in the small mines which are exempt from the safety law is 2½ times higher than that in the larger mines. Moreover, the percentage of fatal accidents occurring in the exempted mines as compared to the total mine fatality figure has shown a steady increase in the past 4 years.

In 1958 preliminary figures show that 29 percent (90 of the total of 312) of the fatalities reported for the entire industry occurred in mines not covered by the Safety Act, although these same mines accounted for only 7 or 8 percent of the total coal tonnage produced in the Nation.

It is evident that Federal inspection of small mines will help save lives there.

The Federal inspectors would not supplant the State inspectors, but would work cooperatively, as they now do, in inspection of the larger mines. The State Department of Mines in Pennsylvania has indicated that it would like to see the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act extended to cover all mines.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the underground coal mine fatal accident statistics, divided as between mines employing 14 or fewer people and mines in which more than 14 persons are employed.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Underground coal mine fatal accident statistics

	1958 [1]		1957 [2]		1956		1955

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I commend my able colleague from Pennsylvania for his leadership in connection with the amendment to the basic Federal Coal Mine Safety Act. It was my privilege to support that measure originally, when I was a Member of the House of Representatives and active in the Committee on Mines and Mining. I was also chairman of the Subcommittee on Coal.

West Virginia, as is true with respect to Pennsylvania, is a State in which we are impressed constantly with the danger to the men who go beneath the earth to mine coal. There is no arbitrary cutoff point. The hazards must be kept at a minimum for those who toil in this industry. It is as important to look after the safety of men working in a mine where 14 or fewer laborers are employed as it is to look after the safety of 50 or 100 or 500 men.

I commend the Senator and join with the Senator in this effort. I hope we will press forward in a vigorous attempt on the part of Members of the Senate to pass this proposed legislation. The original act was necessary. It was right then. It is right now to strengthen the initial purposes.

When the bill was being first considered, I said:

Let us throw every safeguard around those men who go beneath the earth to earn a livelihood.

I urge other Senators to join as cosponsors of this vital measure.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for his remarks and I welcome his support. I know both the Senator from West Virginia and I are Members of the committee to which the bill will be referred, and I hope we will be successful in having it favorably reported.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS KNOWN AS DES PLAINES PUBLIC HUNTING AND REFUGE AREA TO STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the conveyance of certain lands known as the Des Plaines Public Hunting and Refuge Area to the State of Illinois.

The Des Plaines Public Hunting and Refuge Area, which I shall hereafter refer to as the Des Plaines area, forms part of a large acreage of marginal land, acquired by the Army at the outset of World War II for development of the Kankakee Ordnance Plant, which is presently known as the Joliet Arsenal. The Des Plaines acreage proved to be excess as the war developed and was never used for ordnance or arsenal purposes, excepting for isolated areas such as the pumping station and a barracks area at the northern end along the Des Plaines River where troops were stationed.

At the conclusion of World War II, there was a great demand for hunting space in Illinois as well as in other regions of the United States, and steps were taken by the Illinois Department of Conservation to acquire large unused areas for public hunting grounds. Among those sought was the western segment of the Joliet Arsenal, which became available shortly after the conclusion of hostilities. Formal transfer, however, was not made for more than 2 years.

On January 20, 1948, the Department of the Army assigned the Des Plaines area by permit to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for transfer to the State of Illinois. Said transfer was made by permit on March 24, 1948, and the permit was signed in confirmation by Director Livingston E. Osborne of the Illinois Department of Conservation on March 29, 1948.

The permit granted the Illinois department the right to manage the wildlife on the 4,300-acre area, to include public hunting as well as development of wildlife cover and propagation of game birds. With these rights also went the responsibility of policing the area, maintenance, including roads and fences, and the operation of the farm program under the supervision of the Soil Conservation Service and with approval of the farm manager of the Joliet Arsenal.

Wildlife plantings were made in 1948, and the long-range farm plan set up for the 5-year term of the original permit. First public hunting was launched in November 1948, with 3,433 hunters using the area that first year. During the next 3 years, in cooperation with the Army, numerous unneeded buildings were removed, including various farmsteads and barracks. Steps were taken to convert the barracks into a game farm, and pens for pheasants were constructed on the game farm section.

On April 11, 1952, the original 5-year permit was replaced with a 10-year permit, running from the same date of origin until March 24, 1958.

Efforts are now being made to sell portions of this fine recreational area for industrial development. Such action would deny thousands of people in northern Illinois the use of this fine natural facility for hunting and recreational purposes.

During the 9 years of State operation, the Illinois Department of Conservation has expended approximately $293,000 for improvements, repair, or development of the area. This represents a large investment which should be protected.

The State of Illinois, Department of Conservation, has been informally advised by representatives of both the Corps of Engineers and the Ordnance Corps of the Department of the Army that in their opinions, the highest and best use to be made of the Des Plaines property is as an Illinois State game farm, wildlife refuge, and public hunting area.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 747) to provide for the conveyance of certain lands known as the Des Plaines Public Hunting and Refuge Area to the State of Illinois, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT PRACTICES ACT OF 1959

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill entitled the "Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959" which embodies the administration's labor proposals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for 3 days for additional cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk for 3 days, as requested by the Senator from Arizona.

The bill (S. 748) providing further safeguards against improper practices in labor organizations and in labor-management relations; requiring disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and their officers and agents and reports of direct and indirect dealings between them and employers which may conflict with obligations as employee representatives; reinforcing rights of members of labor organizations with respect to funds and property, the election and removal of officers, and the exercise by other labor organizations of supervisory control, of such organizations; providing penalties for certain criminal acts; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, this bill is a comprehensive measure designed to carry out the recommendations of the President encompassed in his message for effective labor-management legislation to assure the American worker and the public that genuine, responsible collective bargaining can be carried on without either destroying or weakening the rights and freedoms of our working people while simultaneously safeguarding the public interest. This bill reflects the general principles which guide the administration with respect to labor-management relations, namely:

First. That it is the firm and permanent national policy to protect by law the right of American workingmen and women to organize into unions and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; and Second. That the primary responsibility for peaceful and effective labor relations rests with labor and management themselves, it being the function of the Government merely to provide a framework of laws to protect the basic rights of individual employees when voluntary processes fail to do so.

The specific provisions of this bill have been carefully drawn to fit the particular practices and abuses toward which they are directed. Adequate reporting and disclosure provisions are provided to insure to union members the right to know whether the union funds derived from their payment of dues and other fees are used solely for their benefit and in accordance with their wishes. Minimum standards are prescribed for periodic elections by secret ballot and in accordance with union constitutional requirements, as well as procedures which will help eliminate abuses in the methods used to exercise supervisory control over subordinate organizations, popularly but not always accurately referred to as trusteeships. These requirements are intended to provide some guaranty that the workers' organizations will be administered so as to reflect the will of their members.

Other provisions of the bill are designed to protect employees against dealings between representatives of labor unions and management which conflict with, and may impair their rights to organize and bargain collectively. In addition, adjustments in existing labor-management relations law are proposed which will remove the statutory prohibition against voting by replaced economic strikers in representation elections and which will permit more equitable and realistic accommodations under the National Labor Relations Act of the relations between labor and management in the building construction industry. An essential provision of the bill, one which will prove substantially useful in curbing racketeering and lawlessness in labor-management relations, is the language permitting the States to take action where the Federal Labor Board declines to assert its jurisdiction. This provision will eliminate the "no-man's land" in existing labor law and provide an administrative or judicial forum where relief may be obtained in almost all labor cases.

In this connection, I would like to emphasize that legislation eliminating the "no-man's land" carries out a specific recommendation to that effect made by the McClellan committee in its interim report of last year. And this is not the only instance in which the administration bill carries out the recommendations of that report. The McClellan committee stated:

> Since union moneys * * * are in actuality a trust, being held for the members of the union by their officers, the committee feels that attention should be given to placing certain restrictions on the use of these funds, such as are now imposed on banks and other institutions which act as repositories and administrators for trust funds.

This bill provides that officers, agents, and other representatives of a labor organization shall have a fiduciary duty to the members of the union requiring them to hold money or other property in their custody or possession by virtue of their position, in trust for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes for which the union exists. It thus carries out this recommendation of the McClellan committee as well. Neither of these McClellan committee recommendations was provided for in the Kennedy-Ives bill of last year, and I regret to say that neither is included in S. 505, introduced several days ago by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN].

Extremely important are those provisions of this bill which provide more adequate protection of neutral employers and employees against secondary boycott abuses and which restrict coercive representation picketing, whether it is called organizational or recognition—to force workers into membership in, or representation by, unions which they reject. One of the conclusions set forth in the interim report of the McClellan committee is that the weapon of organizational picketing has been abused and has been used for purposes, among others, of extorting money from management. In my opinion, any bill which purports to deal effectively with improper activities in the labor-management field must deal with the two devices which have been extensively used to further violence and racketeering—the secondary boycott and the coercive representation picket line.

This program of the administration is a fair and equitable one. The restrictions imposed are directed solely at eliminating specific evils, and the administrative and judicial procedures are designed to provide effective remedies. In this connection I am particularly pleased that the administration bill includes certain sanctions which I have always felt, and on frequent occasions so stated publicly, must accompany the traditional criminal penalties, if the campaign against corruption and racketeering in the labor-management field is to be prosecuted effectively. The possible loss of the statutory privileges of tax-exemption and of resort to the procedures of our Federal labor laws by unions which fail to comply with the bill's provisions concerning their finances, election processes, and trusteeships, should induce practically every union to comply with these provisions.

The bill thus provides adequate and appropriate enforcement powers, without which any legislation in this area would be meaningless. The program will have no punitive effects upon honest employers and labor union officials.

I wish to express my approval and support of these proposals, as a practical and equitable approach to the complex problems in the labor-management field. It is a program which is in the best interest of all parties concerned. I urge that favorable consideration be given this bill at the earliest opportunity.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and the explanatory statement prepared by the Department of Labor be printed in the body of the RECORD, as well as a comparison of this bill with S. 505, the Kennedy-Ervin bill.

There being no objection, the text of the bill, the explanatory statement, and the comparison were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959."

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the activities of labor organizations and the employees they represent have substantial impact on the commerce of the Nation and that Federal laws protecting and encouraging employees in their rights to organize, bargain collectively, and engage in other concerted activities for their mutual benefit and protection, and Federal laws providing tax exemptions for the labor organizations through which employees exercise such rights, clearly manifest the national public interest in these activities. The Congress also finds that it is essential to the protection of this public interest and of the free flow of commerce and to the principle of allowing such tax exemptions that labor organizations and the persons who conduct their affairs and handle their funds be kept responsive to the will of their membership as expressed in democratic procedures and adhere to the highest standards of responsibility to the individual workers who rely on them for proper representation and protection of their rights. The Congress further finds that disclosures of instances of corruption, abuses of trust, disregard of democratic procedures and of the rights of individual workers, and other failures to observe the necessary standards of responsibility indicate the necessity of providing further protection of the rights and interests of individual employees and the public as they relate to the activities of labor organizations and of the responsible officers, agents, and representatives of such organizations and persons who deal with them as employers and their agents and middlemen in labor-management relations matters; and that such further protection is important to the strengthening of the American free enterprise system, to ensuring stability and growth in the Nation's economy, to protecting the revenue of the United States, and to promoting relations between labor and management which avoid burdens, obstructions, and interruptions to commerce.

(b) It is declared to be the policy of the United States to advance the objectives, protect the national interests, and correct the evils referred to in subsection (a), and to deter and penalize these acts and omissions of labor organizations and their officers, agents, and representatives and those acts of employers and their agents and middlemen which are contrary to the rights and interest of the public and of the individual employees such labor organizations represent, by (1) requiring the reporting and disclosure of those organizational and financial affairs of labor organizations and of transactions by persons engaged in labor-management relations in which abuses of trust or authority, conflicts of interest, and other improper activities may occur without knowledge of those affected unless opened to scrutiny; (2) providing remedies for those injured by a disregard of responsibilities arising out of positions of trust; (3) requiring that officers of labor organizations be elected at appropriate intervals through democratic procedures and by secret vote of the members; (4) regulating the imposition on subordinate labor organizations of supervisory control through the appointment of administrators, trustees, or receivers to administer their affairs; (5) providing adequate enforcement measures to assure compliance with the foregoing requirements; (6) ensuring that noncomplying persons whose labor or management practices do not justify the protection of privileges and immunities otherwise available to such persons under Federal law cannot claim any right to such benefits and may be disqualified therefrom; (7) improving provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947; and (8) imposing criminal penalties for willful wrongdoing.

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Definitions

SEC. 101. As used in this Act, except in amendments made by this Act to the National Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended—

(a) "Labor organization" means a labor organization engaged in activities affecting commerce and includes any labor union or any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee, association, group, or plan, so engaged in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, conditions of work, or other matters incidental to employment relationships, and includes further any conference, joint board, joint council, or other local, State, regional, national, or international organization composed of representatives of such labor organizations or in which such labor organizations are associated or with which they are affiliated.

(b) "Employer" means any employer or any group or association of employers which is an employer within the meaning of any law of the United States relating to the employment of any employees or which, with respect to any private or public employment of employees, may deal with any labor organization concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work, and includes any person acting directly as an employer or indirectly in the interest of an employer in relation to an employee, except that as used in provisions of this Act subjecting employers to any requirement, liability, prohibition, administrative sanction, or punishment, "employer" shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision of a State or any employer who is not engaged in any activity or in any industry affecting commerce.

(c) "Employee" includes any individual employed by an employer, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice.

(d) "Person" includes one or more individuals, labor organizations, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, mutual companies, joint-stock companies, trusts, unincorporated organizations, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers.

(e) "Commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof.

(f) An activity or industry "affecting commerce" means any activity or industry in commerce or in which a labor dispute or a violation of this Act would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce, and includes any activity or industry "affecting commerce" within the meaning of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended. Labor organizations engaged in activities affecting commerce include, for purposes of this Act, those labor organizations which have officers or members engaged in such activities, or which represent employees engaged in such activities, or which represent employees or have officers or members who are employed by any employer or in any industry engaged in activities affecting commerce, including any labor organization certified under Federal law, acting, or recognized as the representative of employees of any such employer or in any such industry, or actively seeking to represent any such employees, or receiving or issuing any charter from or to another labor organization which is representing or actively seeking to represent any such employees.

(g) "Labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

(h) "State" includes any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, the Canal Zone, and Outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (ch. 345, 67 Stat. 462).

(i) "United States", when used in a geographical sense, includes all territory specified in clause (h).

(j) "Supervisory control" exercised or assumed by a labor organization over a subordinate labor organization means control or management of funds, other property, operations, or procedures of the subordinate organization through any receivership, trusteeship, or other procedure in which a supervisor, trustee, or other administrator is vested by the superior body with authority normally exercised by any officer or officers or by the membership of the subordinate labor organization.

(k) "Officer" of a labor organization includes any constitutional officer or any member of a board, council, committee, or other body established by the constitution or charter of a labor organization which is elected pursuant to and is empowered by such constitution or charter to exercise governing or executive functions with respect to such labor organization; and except in provisions of this Act referring to the election of officers the term shall include any appointed as well as any elected officer.

(l) "Officer, agent, or other representative" of a labor organization includes elected officials and key administrative personnel, whether elected or appointed (such as business agents, heads of departments or major units, and organizers who exercise substantial independent authority), but not salaried nonsupervisory professional staff, stenographic and service personnel.

(m) "Secret vote" means any vote in which the voter expresses his choice by ballot, referendum, voting machine, or other means, without such choice becoming known to any other person.

(n) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Labor, United States Department of Labor.

Separability of provisions

SEC. 102. If any provision of this Act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this Act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected.

Effective date

SEC. 103. This Act shall become effective sixty days after the date of enactment, except that provisions authorizing the promulgation of regulations shall be effective on the date of enactment of this Act.

TITLE II—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

General requirements

SEC. 201. Every person required to file reports or other documents with the Secretary as provided in this Act shall—

(a) file, at the times and places and in the forms prescribed therefor, such reports or documents containing the information required by this Act;

(b) maintain records on the matters required to be reported which will provide the basic information and related data necessary to explain and verify the reports and documents filed as required by this Act;

(c) keep these records available for examination by the Secretary or his authorized representatives for a period of not less than five years after the filing of reports based on the information which they contain.

Reporting by labor organizations

SEC. 202. (a) Every labor organization shall file with the Secretary copies of its constitution, bylaws, and any other basic documents having similar effect, together with a report, signed by its president or other chief executive officer and by its secretary or other chief records officer, containing the following information:

(1) The name of the labor organization, its mailing address, and any other address at which it maintains headquarters or a principal place of business or at which it keeps the records referred to in section 201(b), (c);

(2) The names and titles of its officers;

(3) The initiation fee or fees required from new or transferred members;

(4) The regular dues or fees required of members to remain in good standing;

(5) Detailed statements, or references to specific provisions of documents filed under this subsection which contain such statements, showing the provision made and procedures followed with respect to each of the following: (i) qualifications for or restrictions on membership, (ii) levying of assessments, (iii) participation in insurance or other benefit plans, (iv) authorization for disbursement of union funds, (v) audit of union financial transactions, (vi) the calling of regular and special meetings, (vii) the selection of officers and stewards and of any representatives to other bodies composed of labor organizations' representatives, with a specific statement of the manner in which each officer referred to in clause (2) was elected, appointed, or otherwise selected, (viii) discipline or removal of officers or agents for breaches of their trust, and (ix) imposition of fines, suspensions, and expulsions of members, including the grounds for such action and any provision made for notice, hearing, judgment on the evidence, and appeal procedures; and

(6) Reference to the specific provisions of documents filed under this subsection which show the procedure followed with respect to (i) authorization for bargaining demands, (ii) ratification of contract terms, and (iii) authorization for strikes.

(b) Every labor organization by which a report has been filed pursuant to subsection (a) shall, after the occurrence of any change in the information required by such subsection, file with the Secretary an amendment to the report, setting forth such change, at the time of filing its next annual financial report under section 203.

(c) Every labor organization, at the time of filing the report required by subsection (a) and annually thereafter at the time of filing its financial report under section 203, shall certify to the Secretary that the constitution and bylaws of the organization contain the provisions with respect to election and removal of officers which are required by title III of this Act and that the organization is complying with all such provisions, Provided: That any labor organization which does not have such provisions in its constitution and bylaws and cannot lawfully incorporate such provisions therein except by constitutional convention may, until its next constitutional convention or until two years after the effective date of this Act, whichever is the earlier date, meet the requirements of this subsection by certifying to the Secretary at the times specified herein the facts which make this proviso applicable, together with a full description of the provisions and procedures for election and removal of officers which are actually followed under its constitution and bylaws. Each certification under this subsection shall be signed by the president or other chief executive officer of the labor organization and by its secretary or other chief records officer.

(d) Every labor organization which exercises or assumes supervisory control over a subordinate labor organization (as defined in section 101(j)) shall file with the Secretary, at the time of filing the report required by subsection (a) or within thirty days after the assumption of such supervisory control, whichever is the later date, and semiannually thereafter a report with respect thereto, signed by its president or other chief executive officer and by its secretary or other chief records officer, which shall certify that such supervisory control was assumed and is exercised in conformity with the applicable requirements of title III of this Act and shall provide the following information: (1) the name and address of the subordinate organization over which supervisory control has been assumed; (2) the date of assumption of such control; (3) the length of the period for which such control has been assumed or is expected to be exercised; (4) why such control was assumed and the reasons, if any, for its continuance; (5) what remains to be done before full autonomy of the subordinate organization may be restored and what steps are being taken to remove any remaining obstacles; (6) whether any delegates to represent such subordinate organization in other bodies or meetings or conventions have been or are being selected and if so, how selected, the nature and extent of participation of the membership in the selection, and the extent of authority of such delegates; (7) an account of any funds transferred from the subordinate organization to the superior organization during the period of supervisory control; and (8) a statement of the amount of normal per capita tax and assessments that would be payable by the subordinate organization if it were not under supervisory control.

SEC. 203. (a) Every labor organization shall file with the Secretary, in such detail as may be required by the Secretary, a report with respect to its financial affairs containing the information required by this section, and shall file such a report annually thereafter. The report shall be signed by the president or other chief executive officer of the labor organization and by its secretary or other chief records officer and its treasurer or other chief financial officer, and shall indicate the method by which the labor organization has made available to its members, pursuant to section 204, the information required to be contained in the report.

(b) Every such annual financial report shall show the assets and liabilities of the labor organization at the beginning and close of its last fiscal year, its financial activities during the year, the amounts and sources of its receipts and the amounts and purposes of its disbursements, including amounts paid as compensation and by way of expense or other allowances for each officer, agent, or employee whose aggregate compensation and allowances for the year exceeded $10,000.

(c) Every such annual financial report shall also explain in detail, or by reference to reports made pursuant to the requirements of section 205 and transmitted as attachments, the full circumstances surrounding the receipt by the labor organization or (to the extent that information is available) by any of its officers, agents, or other representatives of any sum of money, any property, any loan, or any other thing of value which has been received during the year, directly or through an intermediary, from any employer (other than the United States or a wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision thereof) having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the labor organization, or from any person representing such an employer; except that this requirement shall not apply with respect to any transaction which is within the provisions of section 302 (c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended.

SEC. 204. Every labor organization required to file reports or other documents with the Secretary as provided in this Act shall, in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulations prescribe, make available to each of its members the information required to be contained in such reports or documents and, upon request, at reasonable times and under reasonable conditions, the records providing the basic information and data required to be kept as prescribed in section 201(b).

Reports of labor-management financial dealings

SEC. 205. (a) On or before the date prescribed for the filing of the annual financial report of a labor organization required by section 203, every officer, agent, or other representative of such labor organization (as defined in section 101(1)) shall file with the Secretary a signed report as provided in this subsection (which may be filed as an attachment to such annual financial report as provided in section 203(c), or separately) if he or his spouse or minor child, during the preceding fiscal year of such labor organization, has held an interest, has received income or a loan, or has engaged in a transaction of any kind listed in this subsection either directly or indirectly through any third person or otherwise. Such report shall list and describe for such preceding fiscal year—

(1) Any transaction or transactions in which any sum of money, any property, any loan, or any other thing of value has been received or given by such officer, agent, or representative or his spouse or minor child, whether directly or through an intermediary, from or to (i) any employer having employees who are organized or represented by such labor organization or employees whom such organization is actively seeking to represent, or (ii) any person representing such an employer in labor-management relations matters; together with any other transaction or transactions from or as a result of which income or other benefit was derived directly, or indirectly through a third person or otherwise, by such officer, agent, or representative or his spouse or minor child from any such employer; and such report shall identify any third persons involved in such transactions and their part therein: Provided, That no report shall be required of payments of the kinds referred to in section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, or payments and benefits for work performed as a regular employee of such employer, or purchases and sales of goods or services in the regular course of business at prices generally available to any employee of such employer;

(2) Any investment or other interest, legal or equitable, in any employer referred to in clause (1) or any loan to or from such an employer during the period covered by the report which is not reported pursuant to clause (1) and which such officer or agent or representative or his spouse or minor child made or held or participated in or derived income or benefit from directly or indirectly; and

(3) Any investment or other interest, legal or equitable, in any business organization engaged in doing business with such labor organization or in doing business to a substantial extent with any employer referred to in clause (1), any loan to or from such a business, and any transaction with such a business from which income or other benefit was derived, which such officer or agent or representative or his spouse or minor child made or had directly or indirectly during the period covered by the report and which is not otherwise reported under this subsection.

Whenever such officer or agent or representative or his spouse or minor child derives some direct or indirect financial or other benefit from a transaction or activity otherwise reportable under this subsection, the fact that the transaction or activity was not engaged in by him but was engaged in by a relative by blood or marriage or other third person shall not relieve him of the obligation to file a full report thereof.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not be deemed to require a report of any bona fide investments in securities traded on a national securities exchange or in shares of an investment company registered under the Investment Company Act of 1940, or to securities of a public utility holding company registered under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935, or to any income derived therefrom, if such investment does not constitute a substantial enough holding to affect or influence the course of corporate decision.

(c) The requirements of subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to any transaction involving an employer as provided in such subsection, if such employer is the United States or a wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision of a State.

SEC. 206. (a) Every employer shall file with the Secretary a report meeting the requirements of subsection (b), within thirty days after the close of any fiscal year in which such employer, either directly or through an intermediary, has—

(1) participated in any transaction with a labor organization or with any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization, of which a report is required from such organization, officer, agent, or representative under the provisions of section 203 or 205, or

(2) made any payment to any of his employees, or to any group or committee of his employees, or to any other person (except payments to an employee as compensation for or by reason of his regular services as an employee of such employer) for the performance, or pursuant to any understanding or agreement for the performance, by such person or persons of any acts whereby (i) any employee may be subjected to restraint, coercion, or interference in his exercise of rights guaranteed by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or by the Railway Labor Act, as amended, or (ii) information with respect to the exercise of any rights referred to in clause (i) is obtained or is sought to be obtained from any employee and furnished without his knowledge and consent to his employer.

(b) Each report of an employer filed with the Secretary pursuant to the requirements of subsection (a) shall be signed by the president or other chief executive officer and by the treasurer or other chief financial officer of such employer, and shall provide the following information:

(1) The name, address, and position, if any firm or labor organization of every person, including any intermediaries, involved in each transaction or payment during the year of which a report is required by subsection (a), with an explanation of the circumstances of the transaction or payment describing its purpose and the terms of any agreement or understanding in connection therewith and the relationship thereto of each such person; and

(2) What, if any, sum or sums were paid or property was transferred or proceeds or other benefits were received by, from, to, or through each person referred to in clause (1).

Regulations on reports, records and disclosure of reported information

SEC. 207. Reports required to be filed under this Act shall, except as otherwise specifically provided, be filed within 90 days after the effective date of this Act or within 90 days after the date any organization required to file such a report is established, whichever is the later date, and annually thereafter as the Secretary shall prescribe.

SEC. 208. Reports shall be made, records shall be kept, and information shall be disclosed under the provisions of this Act in such form, manner, and reasonable detail as the Secretary shall prescribe, and subject to such regulations as the Secretary shall determine to be necessary to prevent the circumvention or evasion of such provisions.

SEC. 209. (a) The contents of the reports and documents filed with the Secretary pursuant to this Act shall be public information, and the Secretary may publish any information and data concerning labor organizations, employers, and other persons which he obtains pursuant to the provisions of this Act, use the information and data for statistical and research purposes, and compile and publish such studies, analyses, reports, and surveys based thereon as he may deem appropriate.

(b) The Secretary shall by regulations make provision for the inspection and examination, on the request of any interested person, of the information and data contained in any report or other document filed with him pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

(c) The Secretary may by regulations provide for the furnishing by the Department of Labor of copies of reports or other documents filed with the Department pursuant to this Act upon payment of a charge based upon the cost of the service. All moneys received in payment of such charges shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation of the agency of the Department of Labor rendering such service and may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary, and notwithstanding any other provision of law, for the ordinary expenses of such agency.

(d) The Secretary shall make appropriate provisions for access by other Federal departments and agencies to any information and data acquired by him pursuant to the provisions of this title which may be of assistance to such departments and agencies in the performance of their statutory functions.

(e) The Secretary shall make available, or require any person subject to the reporting requirements of this Act to furnish, to such State agency as is designated by law or by the Governor of the State of the domicile or principal place of business of such person, copies of any reports and documents filed by such person with the Secretary pursuant to this Act, or of information and data contained therein.

Statutory provisions amended

SEC. 210. (a) Subsections (f) and (g) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"(f) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by a labor organization under subsection (c) of this section, no labor organization shall be eligible for certification under this section as the representative of any employees, and no complaint shall issue under section 10 with respect to a charge filed by a labor organization, unless such labor organization and any national or international labor organization of which such labor organization is an affiliate or constituent unit can show that prior thereto it has (1) filed with the Secretary of Labor the organizational and financial reports and documents required by sections 202 and 203 of the Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959, and (2) has made available to its members copies of such reports and documents as required by section 204 of such Act.

"(g) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by an employer under subsection (c) of this section, and no complaint shall be issued pursuant to a charge made by an employer under section 10, unless (1) such employer can show that prior thereto he has filed with the Secretary of Labor any reports required of him by section 206 of the Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959, or unless (2) there is on file with the Board an affidavit executed contemporaneously or within the preceding 12-month period by such employer that he has not participated in any of the transactions or made any of the payments of which a report is required by section 206 of such Act."

(b) Clause (1) of section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out "(g),".

(c) Until expiration of the period provided by section 207 of this Act for the initial filing of reports and documents as required by sections 202 and 203, compliance with the provisions of section 9(f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, as those provisions read prior to the amendments made by this section, shall be accepted as compliance with the provisions of section 9(f) of such Act as amended by subsection (a) of this section.

Responsibilities of certain persons

SEC. 211. Each individual required by this Act to sign any report prescribed therein shall be personally responsible for filing such report as prescribed in this Act and for any statements or omissions therein with respect to information required to be contained in the report.

SEC. 212. Nothing in this title shall operate to exempt or relieve any person from any liability, duty, penalty, or punishment otherwise applicable under a law affecting any labor organization subject to the provisions of this Act or its officers or members, unless such application of other law would be contrary to a provision of this Act or would interfere with the carrying out of any objective of this Act.

TITLE III—OBLIGATIONS TO MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Responsibilities of persons entrusted with funds and property of a labor organization

SEC. 301. (a) Every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization having any money or other property of such organization in his custody or possession by virtue of his position as such officer, agent, or representative shall have a duty to the members of the labor organization, requiring him to hold such money or property for the benefit of such members and for furthering the purposes for which the organization exists, and requiring him, in handling such money or property, to invest, apply, disburse, or otherwise dispose thereof only in accordance with such obligation and such purposes and in a manner authorized by the constitution, bylaws, and other governing rules of the organization.

(b) An action or proceeding may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction for an accounting or other appropriate relief with respect to any act or omission of any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization which is in disregard of the duty set forth in this section. Such action or proceeding may be maintained by one or more of the principal officers of such labor organization in behalf of the members thereof, or by any one or more of the members of the labor organization for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other members similarly situated, or by an agent or representative designated by any such member or members to maintain such action or proceeding for and on behalf of all members similarly situated.

(c) Nothing in this section shall reduce or limit the duties or responsibilities of any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization under any other law of the United States or the law of any State, and nothing in this section shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which members of a labor organization are entitled under any such law.

Officers and their election and removal

SEC. 302. (a) Every labor organization shall, in its constitution and bylaws, state the qualifications and terms of office for all responsible officials of the organization and provide complete and detailed procedures for the nomination, election, and removal of officers, which shall meet the minimum standards set forth in this section and shall be given full effect by the organization. Terms of office so specified shall be for a reasonable period, not to exceed five years in any national or international labor organization and not to exceed three years in any local labor organization, and provisions made and followed with respect to qualifications of officers shall ensure that any member of the labor organization, other than members disqualified under any provision of this Act or other law, shall have the right to be a candidate for and hold office, subject to fair qualifications uniformly imposed.

(b) Every labor organization shall hold elections of officers at reasonable intervals, not less often than once in every five years if it is a national or international labor organization and not less often than once in every three years if it is a local labor organization, and shall assure to all members a reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates and to participate, upon due notice, in the election of their local officers directly by secret vote of the members and in the election of their national or other officers either directly by secret vote of the members or through representatives to delegate bodies who are elected directly by secret vote of the members. The right of a member to be, or to nominate, a candidate or to vote in any such election shall not be affected in any manner by any delay or default in the payment of dues which have been withheld by his employer for payment to the labor organization pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement. In providing procedures for and in holding such elections, the labor organization shall provide adequate safeguards, including observers and tellers acceptable to or representing all opposing candidates and physical election facilities acceptable to such candidates, to ensure to all members a free, fair, and honest election and full protection of their rights to vote secretly and without restraint or coercion. Ballots and election records shall be preserved for a reasonable period, not less than one year, after any such election.

(c) Every labor organization shall have and follow procedures which effectively ensure to its members the opportunity directly to remove elected officers from office by majority vote upon a showing that a substantial number of the members desire a recall vote. The standards set forth in subsection (b) for the conduct of elections of officers by secret vote shall be observed whenever the recall of any officer is submitted to vote of the members of the organization and in elections to select successors to removed officers, which shall be held promptly upon the removal of incumbent officers as provided in this subsection.

(d) An action or proceeding may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction by or in behalf of members of a labor organization to obtain appropriate relief with respect to any act or omission of such labor organization, or of any officer, agent, or other representative thereof, which is in violation of the provisions of this section or section 303 and is not a subject of any pending action or proceeding brought by the Secretary under the provisions of title IV of this act. An action or proceeding as authorized by this subsection may be maintained by one or more of the members of the labor organization for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other members similarly situated, or by an agent or representative designated by any such member or members to maintain such action or proceeding for and on behalf of all members similarly situated.

(e) For the purposes of any action or proceeding to enforce requirements of this section, brought under this title or under title IV of this act, a labor organization which can show that any provision required by this section to be incorporated in its constitution and bylaws has not been so incorporated because such incorporation can lawfully be accomplished only by a constitutional convention of the labor organization and such a convention has not been held since the effective date of this Act, shall, until the date of its next regular constitutional convention or until two years after the effective date of this Act, whichever is the earlier date, be relieved from any liability or punishment on account of its failure so to incorporate such required provision in its constitution and bylaws.

SEC. 303. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person—

(1) to contribute or use any moneys of a labor organization or of any employer for the promotion of the candidacy of any person in any election to which section 302 is applicable: Provided, That this shall not be deemed to prohibit the use of moneys of a labor organization for necessary expenses of such election, including the furnishing to members of notices and factual statements of the issues involved; or

(2) to serve as an officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization at any time within 5 years after such person has been convicted of any violation of this act; or

(3) to serve as an officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization during any period in which, by reason of such person's conviction of any crime, such person is ineligible to vote in any election held under the laws of any State; or

(4) being a labor organization or any officer thereof empowered to prevent a person from unlawfully serving as an officer, agent, or other representative of such organization in violation of clause (2) or (3) of this subsection, to permit such person to assume or hold any such office or position in violation of such provision.

(b) Within the meaning of this section, the date of a person's conviction of an offense is the date of the judgment of conviction, except where appeal is taken therefrom in which event it is the date on which the highest court in which review is sought finally refuses to review or reverse such judgment.

(c) Within the meaning of this section, serving as an officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization shall include, but without limitation, serving as a supervisor, receiver, trustee, or other administrator of any of the funds, property, operations, or procedures of a labor organization pursuant to an assumption of supervisory control over such organization by another labor organization.

Supervisory control of one labor organization by another

SEC. 304. (a) Every labor organization which assumes or exercises supervisory control over a subordinate labor organization shall comply with the provisions of this section. No such supervisory control shall be assumed or exercised except in accordance with applicable provisions of the constitutions and bylaws and other governing rules and regulations of the labor organizations involved. In no event shall such supervisory control be assumed or exercised for purposes other than ensuring democratic, responsible, and honest administration of the subordinate organization or effectuating legitimate objects of the labor organizations involved, such as the elimination of practices which are dishonest or corrupt or in disregard of obligations to members of the organization, employers, employees, or the public under applicable laws, collective bargaining agreements, and constitution and bylaw provisions.

(b) Supervisory control exercised by a labor organization over a subordinate labor organization shall not be exercised for any period longer than is reasonably necessary for correction of the evils at which it is directed and full autonomy of the subordinate organization shall be restored promptly upon correction of such evils. In any action or proceeding under this Act, in the absence of clear and convincing proof to the contrary, the continued exercise of supervisory control for a period in excess of eighteen months shall be deemed to be for a period longer than is reasonably necessary for purposes permitted under this section, and where such proof is presented no approval shall be given to any continuation of supervisory control for an additional period in excess of one year.

(c) It shall be unlawful for any labor organization or for any officer, agent, or other representative thereof, during any period in which such labor organization is exercising supervisory control over a subordinate labor organization—

(1) to count or to suffer or permit to be counted the vote of delegates from the labor organization under such supervisory control, in any convention or election of officers of such labor organization, except delegates selected by the members of the subordinate labor organization by secret vote in which all members were given opportunity to participate upon due notice; or

(2) to transfer or to suffer or permit to be transferred to such labor organization any moneys of the labor organization under such supervisory control, except the normal per capita tax and assessments that would be payable by the subordinate organization if it were not under supervisory control (but this shall not prohibit the distribution of the assets of a labor organization in accordance with its charter or constitution and bylaws upon the bona fide dissolution of such organization).

(3) to violate any provision of section 303.

Exercise of rights by labor organization members

SEC. 305. (a) The institution of an action or proceeding by or at the instance of a member of a labor organization to enforce any provision of this title shall not be grounds for disciplinary action by such organization against him.

(b) Nothing contained in this title shall be construed to supersede or modify any existing rights and remedies to which members of a labor organization are entitled under the provisions of the constitution and bylaws of such organization or under the provisions of any law of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands), or to prevent such members from exercising any right which they may have under any such provision.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATION, ENFORCEMENT, AND PENALTIES

Administration

SEC. 401. (a) The provisions of this Act (excluding amendments made by this Act to other statutes) shall, except as otherwise specifically provided therein, be administered by the Secretary, who is empowered to take such action and prescribe such procedures consistent with law and with the policy of this Act as may be necessary to obtain compliance with such provisions and effectuate their purpose.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to make such expenditures and, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel, including attorneys, as may be necessary to carry out his functions and duties under this Act. Attorneys appointed under this section may appear for and represent the Secretary in any litigation, but such litigation shall be subject to the direction and control of the Attorney General.

SEC. 402. There shall be in the Department of Labor a Commissioner of Labor Reports, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall receive compensation at the highest rate established for grade 18 of the General Schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, and shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Secretary or required by law. The Secretary may authorize the performance by the Commissioner of Labor Reports of any functions of the Secretary under this Act or any other law of the United States.

SEC. 403. In the administration of this Act, in order to avoid unnecessary expense and duplication of functions among governmental agencies, the Secretary may make such arrangements or agreements for cooperation or mutual assistance in the performance of functions under this Act and the functions of any such agency as he may find to be practicable and consistent with law. The Secretary may utilize the facilities or services of any department, agency, or establishment of the United States or of any State or political subdivision of a State, including the services of any of its employees, with the lawful consent of such department, agency, or establishment; and each department, agency, or establishment of the United States is authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary and, to the extent permitted by law, to provide such information and facilities as he may request for his assistance in the administration of this Act. The Attorney General or his representative shall receive from the Secretary for appropriate action such evidence developed in the administration of this Act as may be found to warrant consideration for criminal prosecution under the provisions of this Act or other Federal law, and the Secretary may refer to any governmental agency any evidence obtained by him which may tend to show violation of a statute administered by that agency.

Investigation and enforcement

SEC. 404. (a) The Secretary may make such investigations as he deems necessary to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of law contained in or made applicable by this Act (except amendments made by this Act to other statutes) or any rule or regulation authorized by this Act and may require or permit any person to file with him a statement in writing, under oath or otherwise as the Secretary shall determine, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the matter to be investigated. The Secretary is authorized, in his discretion, to publish information concerning any such violations, and to investigate any facts, conditions, practices, or matters, including the accuracy, completeness, and truth or falsity of information and data reported under provisions of this Act, which he may determine to be necessary or proper to aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this Act or in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder.

(b) Any person may make a complaint to the Secretary to the effect that any person has not complied fully with this Act and the Secretary may, subject to the provisions of this Act and other applicable law, take such action upon such complaint as he may deem justified. No such complaint shall be made public by the Secretary except with the consent of the complainant.

(c) The Secretary or his authorized representative shall have the power to prosecute any inquiry necessary to his functions in any part of the United States, and may enter such premises, inspect such records and documents, and make such transcriptions from them, question such persons, hold such hearings, make such findings of fact after notice and hearing, and make such decisions, based upon findings of fact, as are deemed to be necessary or appropriate to the prosecution of any investigation authorized by this Act or to the enforcement of any provision of this Act.

(d) Upon request of the Secretary, the National Labor Relations Board and the National Mediation Board shall make available to the Secretary any documents or records in their custody or possession which the Secretary deems necessary to enable him to carry out his functions under this Act.

(e) To aid him in carrying out his duties of inquiring into procedures followed by labor organizations in certain cases arising under section 302, 303, or 304, the Secretary may from time to time establish Union Procedures Examining Boards to inquire into particular matters and report thereon, and may dissolve such Boards and terminate appointments thereto. Union Procedures Examining Boards shall be composed of a chairman and such other members as the Secretary shall determine, who shall be appointed by the Secretary without regard to any other provision of law regarding the appointment and compensation of employees of the United States. Members of such Boards shall receive as compensation for their services a reasonable per diem, which the Secretary shall by rules and regulations prescribe, for each day actually spent by them in the work of such a Board, and shall in addition be reimbursed for their necessary traveling and other expenses. The Secretary shall furnish such Boards with adequate legal, stenographic, clerical, and other assistance and shall by rules and regulations prescribe the procedures to be followed by such Boards. Such Boards shall have the power to sit and act in any place in the United States and to conduct such hearings as may be necessary to make findings, conclusions, and recommendations on the matters referred to them by the Secretary.

(f) For the purposes of any investigation or hearing provided for in this Act, the provisions of section 307 (relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents) of the Federal Power Act of June 10, 1920, as amended (16 U.S.C. 825f) are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary and any officers designated by him, and to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of any Union Procedures Examining Board conducting any hearing or inquiry in a matter referred to it as provided by this Act.

SEC. 405. The Secretary, whenever it shall appear that any person has violated or is about to violate any of the provisions of title II or section 302, 303, or 304 of this Act, or any order, rule, or regulation of the Secretary promulgated under authority of this Act, may bring an action in the proper court having jurisdiction under section 406 for such relief as may be appropriate including, but without limitation, injunctions to restrain any such violations and orders to compel compliance with the Act and with orders, rules, and regulations issued thereunder.

SEC. 406. The district courts of the United States, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall have jurisdiction of actions brought by the Secretary under section 405 and of actions brought by or on behalf of members of labor organizations under section 301 or 302, and in any such action the court shall have jurisdiction to enter such judgment and such orders as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act and to provide appropriate relief. An action against a labor organization as an entity may be brought in the appropriate district court or other court of the United States having jurisdiction at the place where such labor organization has its principal office or at any other place where such labor organization may be found.

SEC. 407. For the purposes of this Act, the service of summons, complaint, subpena, or other legal process of any court of the United States, or any complaint, subpena, or process of the Secretary in an administrative inquiry or proceeding under this Act, upon an officer or agent of a labor organization (including a person serving de facto as such officer even though challenge of the validity of his election to office has been made), in his capacity as such, shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

SEC. 408. (a) Whenever the Secretary determines upon the basis of a complaint or otherwise that there is reasonable cause to believe—

(1) that any labor organization or any employer has failed or refused to file a true and proper report or other document as required by title II, and has done so willfully and under circumstances which may warrant the imposition of sanctions; or

(2) that any person has violated any of the provisions of sections 302 and 303 pertaining to elections and removal of officers of labor organizations and the qualifications of officers, agents, and other representatives of such organizations, or

(3) that any person has violated any of the provisions of section 304 pertaining to supervisory control of a labor organization by another labor organization, and that appropriate corrective action has not been and will not otherwise be taken, the Secretary shall institute administrative proceedings under this section, in which there shall be made on the record any necessary decisions with respect to whether there have or have not been such violations, and there shall be issued such order or orders as may be necessary and appropriate to effectuate the provisions of this title and achieve compliance with any provision or provisions of this Act found to have been violated. The Secretary shall provide by regulations for administrative proceedings to carry out the provisions of this section in a manner conforming to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act with respect to adjudication on notice and hearing, and any decisions and orders issued under this section shall be made in accordance with the provisions of that Act. The Secretary shall make provision in such regulations for the referral of questions of violation of section 302, 303, or 304 either to a hearing examiner or to a Union Procedures Examining Board appointed and convened as provided in section 404(d), in the discretion of the Secretary, for proceedings to be conducted as provided in subsection (b).

(b) Upon referral by the Secretary of a matter to a hearing examiner or to a Union Procedures Examining Board as provided in subsection (a), such Board or such hearing examiner shall conduct such inquiry, including the holding of hearings, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Upon the conclusion of any such inquiry, such hearing examiner shall issue and certify to the Secretary a decision, or such Board shall file with the Secretary a report, setting forth findings and conclusions with respect to the matter inquired into, together with specific recommendations with respect to the correction or elimination of any violations of the Act which are found to have occurred and with respect to the imposition of administrative sanctions provided by this title. Upon receipt of such decision of the hearing examiner or report of the Board the Secretary shall cause a copy thereof to be served upon the labor organization or other party or parties against whom the proceeding was brought. If within ten days of receipt thereof such party or parties file with the Secretary a declaration of intent to comply with the determination and recommendations of the hearing examiner or of the Board, the Secretary shall grant a reasonable period to such party or parties to effectuate compliance therewith, at the end of which the case shall be dismissed upon satisfactory evidence of compliance submitted by such party or parties to the hearing examiner or to the Board, as the case may be. If no such declaration of intent to comply is filed within the ten-day period, or if after any such declaration no satisfactory evidence of compliance is submitted within the period allowed therefor, the Secretary shall forthwith issue an appropriate order, adopting as his own the decision of the hearing examiner or the findings and conclusions of the Board and ordering that such recommendations be given effect by the party or parties against whom the proceeding was brought, which shall be a final order in such proceeding; unless the Secretary shall have determined to review such findings, conclusions, and recommendations upon his own motion or upon the motion of any aggrieved person, in which event he shall issue a notice thereof. Upon any such review the Secretary shall enter his final order affirming, modifying, or reversing the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the hearing examiner or of the Board.

(c) A final order issued in any proceeding under this section, including any final order in proceedings conducted as provided in subsection (b), shall direct any parties found in violation of the act to take necessary corrective action and may impose the following sanctions for such period or periods (not exceeding five years or such longer period as a violation may continue) and under such conditions as may be determined to be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act:

(1) In the case of a labor organization found to have willfully failed or refused to file a true and proper report as required by title II or to have violated any of the provisions of section 302, 303, or 304, the organization may be declared ineligible (i) to exercise any right or privilege which it might otherwise have under any law of the United States to obtain or retain a certification or other recognition as the representative of any employees, and/or (ii) to institute, or to request or obtain any relief or redress in, any proceeding in which it might otherwise have a right or privilege to do so under the procedures of the National Labor Relations Board or its General Counsel or any other Federal administrative agency exercising decisional functions in labor-management relations matters; and/or (iii) to have the exemption from income taxes provided by section 501 (a) and (c) (5) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended;

(2) In the case of an employer found to have willfully failed or refused to file a true and proper report as required by title II, such employer may be declared ineligible to institute, or to request or obtain any relief or redress in, any proceeding in which he might otherwise have a right or privilege to do so under the procedures of the National Labor Relations Board or its General Counsel or any other Federal administrative agency exercising decisional functions in labor-management relations matters.

Such final order shall, where a violation of section 302 or 303 is found to have affected the outcome of any election of officers, declare the election, if any, to be void and direct an election to be held under such supervision as the Secretary may by order prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary shall in such event make appropriate provision for preserving and safeguarding the assets of the organization pending the election of officers and for protecting the members of the organization from the consequences of any acts of those persons serving as officers pursuant to the void election which he may find to have been in violation of the constitution and bylaws of such organization or of any provision of this Act. No other acts of such persons while serving de facto as such officers shall be deemed invalid by reason of the voiding of the election.

(d) Decisions and orders issued by or on behalf of the Secretary pursuant to this section shall be conclusive upon departments, agencies, or establishments of the United States, which shall not allow the exercise by any person of any right, privilege, or exemption for which such person has been made ineligible under this section. Any final order made pursuant to this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 409 with respect to judicial enforcement and review.

(e) The regulations of the Secretary shall provide for prompt service of copies of the complaint, order, or other document by which any proceeding under this section is instituted, and copies of all motions, notices, decisions, and orders issued in such proceedings. Service of such documents shall be made by certified mail upon each party against whom a proceeding is brought, and upon any Federal departments, agencies, and establishments which, under the provisions of this section, may be required to act or omit to act in accordance with an order issued in the proceeding. After notification of the pendency of any such proceeding, any such department, agency, or establishment may hold in abeyance any matter or proceeding which may be affected by an order under this section until such decision and order has been made, or may take such other action consistent with law and established procedures as it may consider just and proper in the circumstances.

SEC. 409. (a) Whenever any person shall fail or refuse to comply with any order issued under section 408, the Secretary may petition any court of appeals of the United States (including the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia), or if all the courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the United States District Court for the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the violation involved in any proceedings under this title occurred or wherein such person resides, transacts business, or has his principal office, for the enforcement of such order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall certify and file in the court, a transcript of the record in the proceedings, as provided in 28 U.S.C. 2112, as amended. Upon such filing, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the matter decided therein, and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and to make and enter upon the record so filed a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Secretary. No objection that has not been urged before the Secretary or his designated representative shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the Secretary with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing provided under section 408, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Secretary or a hearing examiner designated by him and to be made a part of the transcript. The Secretary may modify his findings and order, or make new findings and issue a new order, by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and he shall file with the court such modified or new findings and order, which findings with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate court of appeals if application was made to the district court as hereinabove provided, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in section 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code, as amended.

(b) Any person agggrieved by an order of the Secretary issued under section 408 may obtain a review of such order in any court of appeals of the United States in the circuit wherein the violation involved was alleged to have been committed or wherein such person resides, transacts business, or has his principal office, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Secretary be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Secretary and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the record in the proceeding, certified by the Secretary and meeting the requirements of 28 U.S.C. 2112, as amended. Upon such filing, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Secretary under subsection (a), and shall have the same exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the Secretary such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and in like manner to make and enter a decree affirming, enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Secretary; the findings of the Secretary with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall in like manner be conclusive.

(c) The commencement of proceedings under this section shall not operate as a stay of the Secretary's order.

(d) Proceedings in the courts of appeals under this section shall be given preference over other cases pending therein, and shall be in every way expedited.

Penalties

SEC. 410. (a) Any person who willfully violates or fails to comply with any provision of this Act requiring the reporting or disclosure of information or the rules and regulations applicable thereto shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(b) Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any document, report, or other information required under the provisions of this Act or the rules and regulations thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 411. Any person who willfully conceals or destroys any book, record, report, statement, or document required by this Act or the rules and regulations thereunder to be kept, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 412. (a) Whoever, being engaged directly or indirectly in or connected in any capacity with (i) the administration, management, or control of money or other property of a labor organization, or of a trust in which such labor organization is interested, or (ii) the making of any report or keeping of any books or records of such labor organization or trust—

(1) embezzles, steals, or unlawfully takes or converts to his own use or the use of another, any moneys, credit, funds, securities, property, or other assets or things of value of any such labor organization or trust, or pledged to or otherwise made a part of funds of such organization or trust, or

(2) makes any false entry in or willfully destroys any book, record, report, or statement kept or made for any such labor organization or trust, with intent to injure, defraud, or mislead such organization, and member or members thereof or such trust or any beneficiary thereunder, or with intent to obstruct legal process, or to mislead anyone authorized or entitled to examine the affairs of such organization or trust, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(b) As used in this section, the term "trust in which a labor organization is interested" means a trust or other organization (i) which was created or established by such labor organization, or one or more of the trustees or one or more members of the governing body of which is selected or appointed by such labor organization, and (ii) a primary purpose of which is to provide benefits for the members of such labor organization or their beneficiaries.

SEC. 413. Whoever willfully performs any act declared unlawful by section 303 or section 304(c) of this Act shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(1) being an employer or a person acting in a representative capacity for or on behalf of an employer, directly or indirectly gives or offers any money or thing of value, or any promise or agreement therefor, or any other bribe, to any officer, agent, or other representative of any labor organization or trust in which a labor union is interested, because of or with intent to influence him in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or other duties as such officer, agent, or other representative of such labor organization or trust, or

(2) being an officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization or trust in which a labor organization is interested, directly or indirectly gives or offers any money or thing of value, or any promise or agreement therefor, or any other bribe, to any employer or any person acting in a representative capacity for or on behalf of an employer, because of or with intent to influence him in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or other duties as or on behalf of an employer which relate to the labor management relations of such employer with employees or their representatives, or

(3) being an officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization or trust in which a labor organization is interested, asks, accepts, or receives any money or thing of value, or promise or agreement therefor, or any other bribe, from any employer or any person acting in a representative capacity for or on behalf of an employer, because of or with intent to be influenced in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or other duties as such officer, agent, or other representative of such labor organization or trust, or

(4) being an employer or a person acting in a representative capacity for or on behalf of an employer, asks, accepts, or receives any money or thing of value, or promise or agreement therefor, or any other bribe, from any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization or trust in which a labor organization is interested, because of or with intent to be influenced in respect to any of his actions, decisions, or other duties as or on behalf of an employer which relate to the labor-management relations of such employer with employees or their representatives, shall be fined not more than three times the amount of such money or value of such thing or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

(b) No witness shall be excused from testifying or producing books, papers, or other evidence in any case or proceeding before any grand jury or court of the United States involving violations of, or conspiracies to violate, this section on the ground that the testimony or evidence required of him may tend to incriminate or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no such witness shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, nor shall testimony so compelled be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding (except prosecutions described in the proviso contained in this subsection) against him in any court: Provided, That no witness shall be exempt under the provisions of this subsection from prosecution for perjury or contempt committed while giving testimony or producing evidence under compulsion as provided in this subsection.

(c) As used in this section, the term "trust in which a labor organization is interested" means a trust or other organization (i) which was created or established by such labor organization, or one or more of the trustees or one or more members of the governing body of which is selected or appointed by such labor organization, and (ii) a primary purpose of which is to provide benefits for the members of such labor organization or their beneficiaries.

SEC. 415. (a) Section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out all of subsections (a) and (b) of said section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any employer, or any person acting in his interest, directly or indirectly, to pay or deliver or agree to pay or deliver any money or other thing of value—

"(1) to any labor organization, or officer, agent or employee thereof, representing any of the employees of such employer who are employed in an industry affecting commerce or to any labor organization any of the members of which are employed in the same trade, craft or class as such employees or to an officer, agent, or employee of such a labor organization;

"(2) to any employee of such employer who is engaged in an industry affecting commerce or to any group or committee of such employees for the purpose of causing such employee or group or committee of employees to interfere with, restrain, or coerce any other employees of such employer in the exercise of any right secured to employees by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or by the Railway Labor Act, as amended.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person to request, demand, receive, or accept, or agree to receive or accept, any payment or delivery of money or other thing of value prohibited by subsection (a) of this section."

(b) Subsection (c) of such section is amended by striking out "representative" in clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "person," by striking out "or" preceding clause (5); by striking out "by such representative" in clause (5); and by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a semicolon in lieu thereof, and by adding thereto the following: "or (6) with respect to money or other thing of value paid by an employer to a trust fund established for the purpose of defraying costs of an apprenticeship or other training program for employees: Provided, That the requirements of clause (B) of the proviso to clause (5) of this subsection shall apply to such trust funds."

TITLE V—LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

SEC. 501. (a) Section 3(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the period at the end thereof the following: "Not more than three members of the Board shall be members of the same political party."

(b) Section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the period at the end thereof the following language: "In case of a vacancy in the office of the General Counsel the President shall designate the officer or employee who shall serve as General Counsel during such vacancy."

SEC. 502. (a) Section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is redesignated "6(a)" and is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection (b):

"(b)(1) The Board, in its jurisdiction, may, by rule or otherwise, decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute where, in the opinion of the Board, the effect of such labor dispute on commerce is not sufficiently substantial to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction.

"(2) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to prevent or bar any agency or the courts of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands), from assuming and asserting jurisdiction over labor disputes over which the Board declines, pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, to assert jurisdiction."

SEC. 503. (a) Section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or

"(ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where an object thereof is: (A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization; (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease, or to agree to cease, using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease, or to agree to cease, doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9; (C) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9; (D) forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class, unless such employer is failing to conform to an order or certification of the Board determining the bargaining representative for employees performing such work: Provided, That nothing contained in this subsection (b) shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer), if the employees of such employer are engaged in a strike ratified or approved by a representative of such employees whom such employer is required to recognize under this Act: Provided further, That nothing contained in clause (B) of this paragraph (4) shall be construed to make unlawful where not otherwise unlawful (i) any strike against, or refusal to perform services for, any person who has contracted or agreed with an employer to perform for such employer work which he is unable to perform because his employees are engaged in a strike not unlawful under this Act; or (ii) any strike or refusal to perform services at the site of the construction, alteration, painting or repair of a building, structure, or other work and directed at any of several employers who are in the construction industry and are jointly engaged as joint venturers or in the relationship of contractors and subcontractors in such construction, alteration, painting or repair at such site, and there is a labor dispute, not unlawful under this Act or in violation of an existing collective bargaining contract, relating to the wages, hours, or other working conditions of employees employed at such site by any of such employers."

(b) Section 303(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) It shall be unlawful, for the purpose of this section only, in an industry or activity affecting commerce, for any labor organization to engage in any activity or conduct defined as an unfair labor practice in section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended."

SEC. 504. (a) Subsection (b) of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (5), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (6) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "and", and by adding a new paragraph as follows:

"(7) to picket or cause to be picketed, or threaten to picket or cause to be picketed, any employer with the object of forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees, or forcing or requiring the employees of an employer to accept or select such labor organization as their collective-bargaining representatives.

"(A) where the employer has recognized in accordance with this Act any other labor organization and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9(c) of this Act, or

"(B) where within the preceding twelve months a valid election under section 9(c) of this Act has been conducted, or

"(C) where the labor organization cannot establish that there is a sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having such labor organization represent them for collective bargaining purposes, or

"(D) where such picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and at the expiration of such period an election under section 9(c) has not been conducted.

"(E) Nothing in this paragraph (7) shall be construed to permit any act which would otherwise be an unfair labor practice under this section 8."

(b) Subsection (1) of section 10 of such Act is amended by striking out the first sentence and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (4)(A), (B), or (C), or paragraph (7) of section 8(b), the preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred."

SEC. 505. Section 8(d) of such Act is amended by striking out all of the language after the colon at the end of paragraph (4) and in lieu thereof inserting the following: "The duties imposed upon employers, employees, and labor organizations by paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) shall become inapplicable upon an intervening certification of the Board under which the labor organization or individual, which is a party to the contract, has been superseded as or ceased to be the representative of the employees subject to the provisions of section 9(a), and the duties so imposed shall not be construed as requiring either party to a contract for a fixed period to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions of employment whether or not embodied in such contract, if such modification is to become effective before such terms and conditions can be reopened under the provisions of the contract. Any employee who engages in a strike within the sixty-day period specified in this subsection shall lose his status as an employee of the employer engaged in the particular labor dispute, for the purposes of sections 8, 9, and 10 of this Act, as amended, but such loss of status for such employee shall terminate if and when he is reemployed by such employer."

SEC. 506. (a) Section 9(c)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by inserting the word "or" after the semicoln at the end of clause (B) and adding a new clause "(C)" as follows:

"(C) by an employer primarily engaged in the building and construction industry and a labor organization acting in behalf of employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the building and construction industry, asserting that such employer recognizes such labor organization as the representative defined in section 9(a) and has entered into a collective bargaining agreement with such labor organization;".

(b) Such subsection is further amended by inserting a colon before the period at the end thereof and adding the following language: "Provided, That the Board may, without prior thereto having conducted an election by secret ballot, certify a labor organization referred to in clause (C) of this paragraph as the exclusive representative of employees of an employer referred to in said clause (C) in such unit as the Board may find is appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other conditions of employment: Provided further, That the preceding proviso shall not apply where there is no history of a collective bargaining relationship between the petitioning employer and labor organization prior to the current agreement or an employee or group of employees or any individual or labor organization acting in their behalf allege, and the Board finds, that a substantial number of employees presently employed by the employer in the bargaining unit assert that the labor organization is not a representative as defined in section 9(a)."

SEC. 507. Section 9(c)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by striking out all of the second sentence thereof.

SEC. 508. Section 9(c)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Board from conducting elections prior to hearing where the Board finds no substantial objection to such proceeding is being made or the waiving of hearings by stipulation for the purpose of a consent election in conformity with the regulations and rules of decision of the Board."

SEC. 509. Section 9(h) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(h)(1) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by a labor organization or employer under subsection (c) of this section, and no complaint shall be issued pursuant to a charge made by a labor organization or employer under subsection (b) of section 10, unless there is on file with the Board an affidavit meeting all requirements of paragraph (2) of this subsection and not found by any court to be false, executed contemporaneously or within the preceding twelve-month period by each officer of such labor organization and the officers of any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit, or by each individual who, as such employer or as an officer or representative of such employer, is engaged in dealing with, or in receiving reports to the employer of dealings with, a labor organization concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment.

"(2) Each affidavit executed pursuant to the requirements of this subsection shall state that the affiant is not, and during the preceding twelve-month period has not been, a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party, and that neither the affiant nor any organization of which he is a member or which he supports, or of which he has been a member or which he has supported during the preceding twelve-month period, believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional method. The provisions of section 1001 of title 18 of the United States Code shall be applicable in respect to such affidavits."

SEC. 510. No provision of this title shall be deemed to make an unfair labor practice any act which was performed prior to the effective date of this title which did not constitute an unfair labor practice prior thereto.

SEC. 511. The amendments made by this title shall take effect 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

EXPLANATION OF A BILL FOR THE ENACTMENT OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT PRACTICES ACT OF 1959

This bill is designed to provide needed safeguards against improper practices in labor organizations and in labor-management relations. It would require the reporting and disclosure of the financial operations and administrative practices of labor organizations, certain financial transactions of their officers, and direct and indirect dealings between officers of such organizations and employers which may involve conflicts of interests. The bill, in general, would reinforce rights of members with respect to the proper administration and application of the funds and property of labor organizations, the election and removal of officers, and protect subordinate organizations and their members from abuses of the devices used to exercise supervisory control over their affairs. In addition, the bill provides certain needed adjustments in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, which will better protect certain employees, the public, and innocent third parties from the consequences of labor disputes, as well as provide improvements in representation procedures with respect to the construction industry to more adequately meet the needs of labor-management relations in that industry.

As recommended by the President—

All unions would be required to file annual reports with the Department of Labor with respect to their financial operations and to furnish such information to their members. In addition, unions would be required to file copies of their constitutions and bylaws along with detailed information with respect to their organization and procedures, including certification that prescribed minimum standards for the election and removal of officers are provided and being followed.

Information required to be reported under the act would be open to the public, and unions would be required to keep adequate records on matters to be reported which would be open to examination by Government representatives and, upon request, accessible to union members.

Unions, union officers and agents, and employers would be required to report and keep records regarding any payments or transactions, including those engaged in through employer intermediaries, which may create conflicts of interests or involve interference with the statutory collective bargaining and organizational rights of employees.

Union funds and property would be required to be held and administered for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes of the union and such duty would be enforcible in any court in a suit by, or in behalf of, its members.

All unions would be required to hold periodic elections of officers and to observe minimum standards for the conduct of elections, including the right of all members to vote, with due notice, by secret ballot without restraint or coercion, equal opportunity for all members to nominate and be candidates, and the provision of procedures and facilities to ensure honest elections and the accurate tabulation of votes; the use of union or employer funds to promote any candidate for union office would be banned and union constitutions and bylaws would have to contain detailed statements of election procedures and compliance with such procedures would be required to be certified to by the principal executive officer.

All unions would be required to observe minimum standards, including conformity with applicable provisions of their constitutions and bylaws in the exercise of supervisory control over the affairs of subordinate bodies, the exercise of such control to be limited to purposes of ensuring democratic, honest, and responsible administration of the subordinate body and effectuating legitimate objectives of the labor organization.

The administration of this legislation would be placed in the Secretary of Labor and he would be provided with adequate authority to issue regulations, investigate, subpena witnesses and documents, hold hearings, issue decisions and orders (which would be subject to judicial review) requiring compliance and imposing sanctions for willful violations, and bring actions in the Federal courts for injunctions to compel compliance with the act.

The bill would provide criminal penalties or administrative sanctions of loss of tax exemption or the use of or access to procedures under Federal labor-management relations statutes for willful violations of the act; it would also prescribe criminal penalties for concealment or destruction of records required by the act to be kept, bribery between employers and employee representatives, embezzlement of union or certain trust funds, and false entry or destruction of union books and records.

Any present remedies that union members have under State or Federal laws, in addition to those provided in the bill, would be preserved.

The secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act would be strengthened and extended so as to cover direct coercion of secondary employers and inducements of individual employees to refuse to perform services with an object of forcing their employer to cease doing business with another person, and to include employers not otherwise covered by the act under the protections of the provisions; it would also be made clear that union activity is permitted against secondary employers performing "farmed-out" struck work for the primary employer and, under certain circumstances, against secondary employers engaged in work at a common construction site with the primary employer.

It would be made an unfair labor practice, subject to mandatory injunction, for a union to picket in order to coerce an employer to recognize it as bargaining representative of his employees or such employees to accept or designate it where: the employer has recognized another union in accordance with law, a representation election has been conducted within the preceding 12 months, it cannot be shown that there is a sufficient showing of interest on the part of the employers to be represented by such union, or picketing has continued for a long period of time without a representation election.

The National Labor Relations Board would be authorized to decline to assert jurisdiction over cases where it considers the effect on commerce is not substantial enough to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction and State courts and agencies would be permitted to exercise jurisdiction over these cases.

The provision of the National Labor Relations Act which bars certain strikers from voting in a representation election, although their replacements may vote, would be eliminated and the voting eligibility of strikers, as well as others, would be left to the administrative discretion of the Board; the Board also would be permitted to conduct representation elections without prior hearings where there is no substantial objection to such an election.

The Board would be authorized to certify building and construction trades unions as bargaining representatives without an election, under carefully considered specific conditions.

Employers, as well as unions, wishing to use the Board's procedures would be required to sign non-Communist affidavits, thus equalizing the burden of such affidavits; this requirement would be strengthened by providing that an affidavit found by a court to be false shall not constitute compliance and requiring that the affidavit relate to conduct during the 12-month period preceding its execution.

It would be made clear that parties to a valid collective-bargaining agreement need not bargain during the life of the agreement unless they have provided for a reopening, or such reopening is mutually agreeable.

It would be required that the Board be bipartisan in composition by providing that no more than three members may be of the same political party and the President would be authorized to designate an acting General Counsel of the Board when vacancies occur in that office.

A summary discussion of the bill by title and section follows:

Section 1 of the bill provides a short title for the legislation, the "Labor-Management Practices Act of 1959."

Section 2 consists of the congressional findings and policy showing the relationship of the subject matter to the free flow of commerce and the national public interest in the activities of labor organizations and the employees they represent.

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Definitions

Section 101: This section defines 14 terms used throughout the act, including "labor organization," "employer," "employee," "person," "commerce," "affecting commerce," and "supervisory control."

Separability of provisions

Section 102: This section provides that if any provision of the act is held to be invalid, the remainder of the act shall not be affected.

Effective date

Section 103: The act becomes effective 60 days after the date of enactment, except that provisions authorizing the promulgation of regulations become effective immediately.

TITLE II—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

General requirements

Section 201: This section obliges every person required to file reports or other documents with the Secretary of Labor under the act to file them in the manner required thereby, to maintain records necessary to explain and verify them, and to keep such records available for examination by the Secretary or his representative for at least 5 years.

Reporting by labor organizations

Section 202: This section requires every labor organization to file with the Secretary a copy of its constitution and bylaws and other basic documents along with a report, signed by its president (or other chief executive officer) and its secretary (or other chief records officer), containing detailed information, or references to the provisions of the governing documents containing such information, with respect to its major internal structure and procedures, including provisions for discipline or removal of officers or agents for breach of trust and provisions made for notice, hearings, judgment on the evidence and appeal procedure in connection with disciplinary action against members. Any changes in the reported information must be shown by an amendment filed when the next annual financial report is due.

Each labor organization must also certify annually that its constitution and bylaws contain the provisions for election and removal of officers required under title III, but a period of 2 years or until the next constitutional convention (whichever is earlier) is allowed to enable unions to incorporate such provisions in their constitution and bylaws if they certify during this interim period as to their existing provisions and procedures.

In addition, every labor organization exercising or assuming supervisory control over a subordinate labor organization must make, within 30 days of such assumption or at the time of filing the report required by this section and semiannually thereafter, a report certifying that the requirements of title III are being observed and showing the union under control, the date control was established, the reason for the control and its duration, the steps being taken to reestablish autonomy, and specified information respecting voting rights of members and finances of the supervised body.

Section 203: Every labor organization must also file with the Secretary an annual report with respect to its financial affairs and indicating the method by which this report is made available to its members. These reports must show, among other things, the assets and liabilities of the organization at the beginning and close of its last fiscal year and amounts paid as compensation and expense or other allowances for each officer, agent, and employee whose aggregate compensation and allowances for the year exceeded $10,000. They must also explain in detail, or by reference to other reports, all receipts by the organization or any of its officers or agents of anything of value other than payments allowed under section 302(c) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, from an employer having employees who are, or might be, represented by the labor organization, or from any person representing such an employer.

Section 204: This section requires every labor organization to make the information contained in its reports, and the records and data required to be kept, available to its members in the manner prescribed by the Secretary.

Reports of labor-management financial dealings

Section 205: This section requires every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization to file reports with the Secretary with respect to all direct and indirect payments to or from employers having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the union or to or from persons representing any such employers (including transactions engaged in by a spouse or minor child). Also requires information on investments and business transactions so related to such an employer as to possibly involve conflicts of interest. If the officer, agent, or representative of the union derives direct or indirect benefit from any such transaction it must be reported even if the direct participant was some relative or other third person rather than the union official himself. Payments allowable under section 302(c) of the LMRA, regular remuneration for service as an employee, purchases and sales in regular course of business at regular prices, and bona fide investments in traded securities not involving substantial interest need not be reported.

Section 206: Any employer who participated directly or indirectly in any transaction required to be reported by unions or their officers, agents or representatives under sections 203 or 205, or who paid employees or others for the performance of any acts whereby employees may be restrained, coerced, or interfered with in the exercise of rights secured by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act or by the Railway Labor Act, must file a report with the Secretary. These reports will identify the persons, including intermediaries, involved in the transaction, explain the circumstances of the transaction, and specify the sums, property, or benefit involved.

Regulations or reports, records and disclosure of reported information

Section 207: This section requires that reports be filed within 90 days after the effective date of the act or the establishment of the reporting organization, and annually thereafter as prescribed by the Secretary.

Section 208: This section authorizes the Secretary to prescribe such standards for required reports, recordkeeping, and disclosure of information, as may be necessary to prevent circumvention or evasion of the act's provisions.

Section 209: The contents of reports and documents filed with the Secretary are made public information, and he is authorized to publish and use such information for statistical and research purposes. He is also authorized to prescribe regulations providing for the examination by the public of the information contained in the reports and documents, and to furnish copies of the documents filed with him upon payment of the cost of the service. Copies of reports required to be filed will be made available by the Secretary, or by the reporting person, to appropriate State agencies.

Statutory provisions amended

Section 210: This section amends sections 9 (f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act to substitute compliance with the filing requirements of this act for the present requirements of these subsections. This compliance is made a prerequisite to use of the NLRB facilities by both labor organizations and employers.

Responsibilities of certain persons

Section 211. Provides that union and company officers required to sign reports under the act shall be personally responsible for the filing, accuracy and completeness of the statements in the reports.

Section 212: Provides that nothing in title II shall relieve any person from complying with the provisions of any law affecting any labor organization unless such provisions would conflict with the provisions, or interfere with carrying out the objectives, of this act.

TITLE III—OBLIGATIONS TO MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

Responsibilities of persons entrusted with funds and property of a labor organization

Section 301: This section imposes upon every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization having any of the organization's money or property in his possession or custody by virtue of his position a duty to hold such money or property for the benefit of the members and for furthering the purposes of the organization and to handle it only in accordance with such duty and in a manner authorized by the organization's governing rules.

A right of action in any court of competent jurisdiction to obtain relief for disregard of such duty is conferred upon union members or principal officers. The applicability of other laws respecting the duties and responsibilities of union representatives is preserved.

Officers and their election and removal

Section 302: This section requires union constitutions and bylaws to state the qualifications and procedures for nomination, election, and removal of officers, which must conform to certain minimum standards. These include limitation of terms of office to not over 5 years for officers of internationals and 3 years for those of locals, and assurance of the right of any member to run for and hold office. Members must be given reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates and to participate in secret elections, and ballots and election records must be preserved for at least a year. Rights of a member under these provisions shall not be affected by a failure of an employer to pay dues "checked off." Union shall provide facilities and procedure to insure free, honest elections and accurate count of votes.

Unions are also required to have and follow procedures and standards insuring members the opportunity to remove elected officers from office by majority vote upon a showing that a substantial number of members desire a recall. Election of successors to recalled officers shall be held promptly and in accordance with required election standards.

The right to bring suit in any court of competent jurisdiction for enforcement of the provisions of this section or the election provisions contained in section 303 is conferred upon union members where the violations are not the subject of any pending action or proceeding brought by the Secretary under title IV. However, a grace period of 2 years or until the next constitutional convention is provided for unions which can make necessary changes only by a constitutional convention.

Section 303: Use of union or employer funds to promote the candidacy of any person in a union election is prohibited. It is also made unlawful for any person convicted of violations of this act to serve as an officer, agent, or other representative of a union within 5 years of conviction, for any person to so serve while ineligible to vote because of a conviction for any crime, or for any union or union official having preventive power to permit any such ineligible person to serve.

Supervisory control of one labor organization by another

Section 304: Compliance with the provisions of this section is required of every labor organization assuming supervisory control over another. Such control shall be exercised only according to the governing rules of the labor organizations involved and to insure democratic, responsible, and honest administration of the subordinate body. The exercise of such supervisory control is limited to the period reasonably necessary for correction of evils. A presumption is created that a period of over 18 months is not reasonably necessary; but, if rebutted, additional extension of supervisory control for not over 1 year may be approved. Limitations are imposed upon the union exercising supervisory control with respect to counting votes or delegates and transferring funds of the subordinate union.

Exercise of rights by labor organization members

Section 305: This section prohibits disciplinary actions against union members for institution of actions or proceedings to enforce title III. It also preserves existing rights and remedies under union constitutions and bylaws and under State or Territorial law.

TITLE IV—ADMINISTRATION, ENFORCEMENT, AND PENALTIES

Administration

Section 401: This section states that the provisions of the act, other than amendments of existing statutes, are to be administered by the Secretary who is empowered to take action and prescribe procedures necessary to effectuate act. Secretary authorized to make expenditures and appoint personnel, including attorneys who may represent him in any litigation subject, however, to the direction and control of the Attorney General.

Section 402: Provides for a Commissioner of Labor Reports, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to perform such duties under this and other statutes as the Secretary may delegate to him.

Section 403: This section authorizes arrangements by the Secretary for cooperation and assistance from other governmental and State agencies and provides for referral of evidence of violations of this act or other Federal law to the Attorney General or other Federal enforcement agencies.

Investigation and enforcement

Section 404: The Secretary is authorized to investigate alleged violations of provisions of act or rules or regulations issued thereunder, to publish information with respect to violations, and to make such investigations with respect to the accuracy and completeness of required reports as may be necessary in the enforcement of the act. He is also authorized to receive and take action upon complaints of violations of the act, but complaints shall not be made public except with complainant's consent. The Secretary or his authorized representatives are given powers of entry, inspection, and interrogation, as well as to hold hearings and make findings of fact and decisions based on them.

This section further authorizes the Secretary to establish Union Procedures Examining Boards to inquire into certain cases under the act, to conduct necessary hearings, and to make findings, conclusions, and recommendations to the Secretary. The subpena power provided by the Federal Power Act is made applicable to the Secretary and his authorized representatives, including the Union Procedures Examining Boards, for the purposes of any inquiry under the act.

Section 405: The Secretary is authorized to bring actions to restrain or prevent violations of the reporting, union election and supervisory control provisions of the act and to compel compliance with the act and orders issued thereunder.

Section 406: This section confers jurisdiction on the U.S. district courts (and other appropriate Federal trial courts) of actions brought, under the act, by the Secretary or by union members.

Section 407: Under this section, service upon an officer or agent of a labor organization, in his capacity as such, shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

Section 408: This section directs the Secretary, upon determination that there is reasonable cause to believe that there has been a willful failure to file required reports or that any person has violated the election, removal, or supervisory control provisions, to institute administrative proceedings conforming to the Administrative Procedure Act. Violations of provisions relating to election and removal of officers and the exercise of supervisory control may be referred to either a hearing examiner or a Union Procedures Examining Board. The procedure of these proceedings is outlined.

A final order of the Secretary, made on the record of the proceedings, may direct necessary corrective action and impose sanctions for not over 5 years (unless the violation continues longer). These sanctions consist, in cases where an employer is found to have willfully refused to file a report, of loss of the right to exercise any right or privilege under any Federal labor-management relations statute. A union found to have willfully failed to file a report or to have violated the provisions relating to the election and removal of officers and the exercise of supervisory control over subordinate bodies may also be declared ineligible to exercise any right or privilege under any Federal labor relations law and/or to have the income tax exemption granted by section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code. Where the outcome of a union election is found to have been affected by violations of the election provisions of sections 302 and 303, the final order may void the election and direct another under such supervision as may be necessary.

The decisions and orders of the Secretary under this section shall be conclusive upon other Federal agencies with respect to withdrawal of Federal rights and privileges involved, but they are subject to judicial review and enforcement as provided in section 409. Upon notice that a proceeding under this section is pending, Federal agencies may hold in abeyance or take other appropriate action in matters which may be affected by the Secretary's order.

Section 409: This section provides for enforcement of the orders of the Secretary, and for review of these orders upon petition of aggrieved parties, by the U.S. courts of appeals in the same manner as NLRB orders are reviewed. The commencement of enforcement or review proceedings will not stay the Secretary's order.

Penalties

Section 410: Willful violations of reporting and disclosure provisions of the act or applicable regulations are punishable by fine up to $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both. A fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment of not more than 5 years, or both, may be imposed for willfully making false statements or failing to disclose material facts.

Section 411: A fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, may be imposed for willful destruction of records or documents required to be kept.

Section 412: Embezzlement of the funds of a union or a trust in which it is interested, or false entries in or destruction of books and records of a union or such a trust with intent to defraud or mislead, are punishable by fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

Section 413: This section provides for a fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both, for willful violations of provisions prohibiting use of funds to influence union elections and barring certain law violators as union officers (sec. 303) and of provisions protecting unions undergoing supervisory control (sec. 304(c)).

Section 414: This section prohibits the offer, gift, solicitation, or acceptance, to or from each other, of payments in the nature of bribes by employers and their representatives and representatives of unions or trusts in which they are interested, with intent to influence actions—or to have actions influenced—as a representative of the union or trust or, in the case of an employer or his representative, with respect to labor-management relations of the employer. Violations are punishable by fine up to three times the amount involved or imprisonment for not more than 3 years, or both. Immunity would be provided from prosecution because of self-incriminating testimony given before courts and grand juries involving violations of these bribery provisions, except in the case of perjury or contempt arising from such testimony.

Section 415: This section amends section 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, to extend its coverage to payments (1) by any person acting in the interest of an employer (as well as by the employer himself) to unions having members employed in the same trade or class as the employees of such employer (as well as to unions representing his own employees), and (2) to any employee or group or committee of employees of the employer for the purpose of interfering with, restraining or coercing the exercise by other employees of the employer of their self-organization rights under Federal labor relations laws (except compensation for regular services). The receipt of any such payment is also made unlawful.

This section also amends subsection (c) of section 302 so as to add to the types of payments excepted from the prohibitions of the section those made by employers to jointly administered trust funds established for the purpose of defraying the costs of apprenticeship and training programs.

TITLE V—LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Section 501: This section provides that not more than three members of the National Labor Relations Board shall be members of the same political party. In addition, it makes clear that when the office of the General Counsel of the Board becomes vacant the President may designate some other officer or employee to serve as acting general counsel during the vacancy.

Section 502: This section amends section 6 of the National Labor Relations Act to make clear that (1) the Board may by rule or otherwise decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute where, in its opinion, the effect on interstate commerce is not sufficiently substantial" to warrant exercise of its jurisdiction and (2) State agencies and courts may assume jurisdiction over such disputes where assertion of jurisdiction is declined.

Section 503: This section extends the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to (1) direct coercion of employers to cease, or agree to cease, doing business with another, (2) inducement or encouragement of employees individually to refuse to perform services, and (3) to include within the scope of the provisions secondary employers who do not come within the act's definition of "employer," such as railroads and municipalities. The section makes clear that those prohibitions do not extend to activities directed at secondary employers performing for a primary employer "farmed out" struck work or those engaged at a common construction site with another employer with whom a lawful labor dispute exists with respect to wages, hours, or other working conditions of employees working at that site.

Section 504: This section amends section 8(b) of the National Labor Relations Act to make it an unfair labor practice for a union to engage in, or threaten to engage in, organizational and recognition picketing where (1) the employer has recognized in accordance with the act any labor organization and a question concerning representation may not be raised under section 9(c) of the act, (2) within the last preceding 12 months a valid election has been conducted, (3) the union cannot establish the existence of sufficient interest on the part of the employees in having it represent them, or (4) picketing has been engaged in for a reasonable period of time and an election under 9(c) has not been conducted. A savings provision makes it clear that this new provision is not intended to make lawful any activity which is otherwise an unfair labor practice under the act. The section further makes violations of the organizational and recognition picketing provisions subject to the mandatory injunction provided in section 10(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 505: This section amends section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act to make it clear that the collective bargaining requirements of section 8 do not require a party to a valid collective bargaining contract to bargain during the life of the contract with respect to any modification which would become effective before a reopening is permitted by the terms of the contract or by agreement of the parties.
